BYRD FLIGHT COVERS 35,000 SQUARE MILES OPEN TO U. S. CLAIM

Dr. Bowman Estimates Extent of Latest Aerial Exploration Outside British Domain.

SURVEY TO SEA NECESSARY

This Is Because of Start From Ross Dependency, Geographic Society Director Explains.

NEW TOPOGRAPHY MAPPED

Scientist Stresses the Mountains, Coastline and Arm of Sea Inland Among Discoveries.

The United States is in position to lay claim to 35,000 square miles of Antarctic territory lying along a hitherto unknown coast line about 250 miles in length, as a result of Commander Byrd's latest flight, according to Dr. Isaiah Bowman, director of the American Geographical Society. This new territory and coast line, he said yesterday, lies entirely outside the Ross Dependency claimed by Great Britain.

He praised Commander Byrd's perspicuity in taking the direction he did, and, after plotting on a chart the course, the new mountains, islands, coast and inlet, exclaimed, "Magnificent! Byrd did exactly the right thing. We will really know something about the Antarctic before he gets through. Getting up in the air in a plane is what does the trick."

Explaining the value of the photo-mapping flight from the point of view of a geographer, he said that while Commander Byrd had already discovered new territory, in order to set up what would be recognized as a valid claim under present international usage, it would be necessary to "make a tie-up with the coast line," which had not yet been done.

Must Establish Link With Coast.

"The eastern limit of the Ross Dependency," he said, "is the 150th Meridian West, and Marie Byrd Land lies east of that meridian. The Rockefeller Range, on the contrary, lies west of the 150th meridian within the Ross Dependency.

"Since Commander Byrd's base camp also lies in the Ross Dependency, it was necessary, in setting up an independent claim on the part of the United States—in case either Commander Byrd or the United States Government wished to maintain such a claim—that there should be made an independent and continuous connection between these new discoveries and the sea at a point where no question of conflict of claims could come into the argument.

"Happily, Commander Byrd returned from his polar flight with his crew and his planes in first-class condition. He saw the significance of such a flight and set out upon it, going 350 miles almost due northeast from Little America.

Route Followed by Byrd.

"To make this distance it was necessary first of all to round Cape Colbeck and to traverse the coastal belt to Biscoe Bay, for it is on the eastern coast of Biscoe Bay that the shore line traverses the boundary of the Ross Dependency, and it is also here that he would jump into the unknown, since the shore line beyond this point had never been seen by man nor had any one been able even to conjecture its position.

"After skirting the coast of Biscoe Bay through half its length, he passed the Scott Nunatak and the Alexandra Mountains. Here he came into full view of the great topographic feature that is his latest discovery. The wind had blown the ice away in an off-shore belt that fortunately provided a well-defined line which he could trace right to the limit of visibility.

"As the accompanying map shows, he turned and ran parallel with the shore, keeping the new mountain range to his right until he reached the seventy-fifth parallel. There he could see the well-defined shore line turning eastward and even dipping southward before it was lost in its eastward swing.

"His camera caught the northern end of the range at a distance of fifty to sixty miles, and the coast line which cuts it off, as well as the off-shore islands that represent the northward continuation of the range.

Probable Arm of Sea Discovered.

"With at least 150 miles of entirely new coast line recorded, practically all of it outside the Ross Dependency, Commander Byrd then turned east and south and skirted the new mountain range until he was satisfied of its deep penetration into Marie Byrd Land, well outside the 150th meridian.

"In addition, he identified what

Longworth Is Thanked by Byrd For Congratulations of House

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Speaker Longworth made public today a message from Commander Byrd expressing his thanks for the message voicing the congratulations of the House of Representatives upon his flight over the South Pole. Commander Byrd's acknowledgment, dated Little America, Dec. 4, and sent by radio through THE NEW YORK TIMES Station, reads:

"For my companions and myself I send you our deep appreciation for the honor you have paid us. It has encouraged every inhabitant of Little America. What we have been able to accomplish has been a forty-man job, where every man has had to do his part, and only the unusual enthusiasm and manhood of my shipmates has pulled us through.

"For them and myself I thank you most sincerely and send you greetings and kindest wishes.

"Very many thanks to you personally, and kindest regards always."

NELSON, NEAR CRASH, DROPPED A MESSAGE

Mail Pilot's Note to Searchers Showed He Realized His Peril in Crippled Plane.

LINDBERGH IN AIR TRIBUTE

He Leads Squadron of Planes That Drop Flowers as Flier Is Buried at Plainfied.

By The Associated Press.

WARREN, Ohio, Dec. 7.—A "farewell message" from Pilot T. P. Nelson of the air mail service, who lost his life in the crash of his plane near Chagrin Falls early Monday, showing that the flier had realized that disaster was near, was found here today. Written on a piece of paper tied to a small piece of metal, it had been dropped by Nelson from his plane shortly before the fatal crash.

"Search for me in this section. Trouble," it said. At the bottom of the message Nelson had signed: "T. P. Nelson, N. A. T."

Gretchen King, 10-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank R. King, found the note this morning, hanging from an eave trough on her home.

Nelson, who was bringing the air mail from Bellefonte to Cleveland, had battled through perilous flying conditions of a snowstorm above the mountains of Western Pennsylvania during the night. Evidently his plane was in a crippled condition when he reached the vicinity of Warren and he realized it might not hold up much longer.

Faced Death Calmly.

With the possibility of a tragic death staring him in the face, and with a crash and resultant injuries almost certain, Nelson tried to arrange so that the searchers who were bound to look for him would find him as quickly as possible. So he wrote the note and dropped it.

The pilot, known as one of the best in the air mail service, had gambled on the chance of completing the flight instead of trying a forced landing, or had merely tried to keep in the air as long as possible. Fate stepped in and dashed the crippled craft to the ground.

Nelson apparently jumped just before the craft hit, but it was too late for his parachute to save him.

The coroner at Chagrin Falls said, soon after Nelson's body was found Thursday, that the pilot had been rendered unconscious and died of exposure. Despite a frantic search by fifteen fellow-workers, the discovery of Nelson's plight came too late.

If the "farewell message" had

108-MILE GALE ROARS OVER BRITISH ISLES; HEAVY LOSSES AT SEA

21 Believed Drowned as Ship Sinks in Sight of Land—Ten Vessels Stranded.

FEAR FOR ITALIAN ART SHIP

Vessel Carrying $70,000,000 Pictures for London Show Fails to Report.

EIGHT ARE KILLED INLAND

Carpentier Is Among Those Hurt on the Homeric—French Coast Reports Widespread Damage.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 7.—Overwhelmed by mountainous seas though within sight of land, the British steamer Radyr sank off North Devonshire early this morning in the second wild gale which has battered the British coasts within forty-eight hours. The entire crew of twenty-one is believed drowned. Tonight an empty boat was washed ashore near Bideford as silent proof of the disaster.

The sinking of the Radyr was the worst disaster of the storm, which has caused the stranding of ten vessels and has disabled six others. Into all the English Channel ports ships crept to shelter with officers telling of a hurricane such as few could remember. At the Scilly Isles the wind roared at a velocity of 108 miles an hour and blew the needle of the recording instrument off the chart. The record gale velocity for England is 111 miles an hour.

Italian Art Ship Silent.

Uneasiness was felt in London tonight over the Italian ship Leonardo da Vinci, which, with its $70,000,000 cargo of Italy's greatest art, is battling the gale in the Bay of Biscay on its way to London.

Ever since the vessel left Genoa she has been sending daily reports of her progress. Yesterday morning she reported she was passing Gibraltar and making good headway, but today the usual wireless message had not arrived. The Leonardo da Vinci is escorted by an Italian Admiralty tug.

Although it is said the ship is insured for $40,000,000, the pictures in her hold are priceless and their value is beyond exact computation. They include superb Raphaels, Titians, Tintorettos and Botticellis for London's great exhibition of Italian art next month.

Cross-Channel steamers to Calais and Boulogne had to cancel their journeys and all Imperial Airways flights to the Continent were abandoned.

Braves Seas to Save 19.

The lone coast guard at Hartland Point, Devonshire, was the only eyewitness of the disaster to the Radyr. The ship sent S O S calls for vessels to stand by, but no lifeboat had a chance in the raging seas. The coast guard watched her settle down and disappear, with no help any where within reach.

After an S O S message saying the crew had taken to the boats there was silence.

Elsewhere lifeboat crews performed heroic work, rescuing steamers in distress. The gallantry of one young Cornishman named Laity saved the lives of nineteen men of the French steamer Ornais, which grounded in Mount Bay, Penzance. Rockets were fired over the Ornais, but without success. Then Laity volunteered to swim the 100 yards to the ship. Dodging through the waves, he succeeded in carrying a line to the stricken vessel which was fast

Two Outgoing Liners Crash in the Hudson; Transylvania Off After Delay, Other Is Held

Two outward bound steamships were in a collision at 1:45 P. M. yesterday off Pier A in moderately clear weather and both vessels returned to their piers to ascertain the damage.

One was the Anchor liner Transylvania, with 258 passengers on board bound for Moville and Glasgow, and the other was the Southern Pacific steamer Creole, leaving for New Orleans with sixty-nine passengers.

The Transylvania had two of her top plates and part of the rail torn away on the port side about sixty feet from the stern, and the coastwise steamer's bow was twisted and some of the plates torn by the impact, which was well about the water line.

After the examination the Transylvania left at 7:45 P. M. The Creole went to the Tietjen & Lang drydock, Hoboken, for temporary repairs and was expected to be ready to sail early this morning.

The passengers on both ships were at luncheon and few knew of the crash until they came on deck and found they were going back up the North River.

Captain David W. Bone, master of the Transylvania, said that he could not see any reason for the accident as the weather was clear and there was plenty of room.

"As the overtaking ship it was the Creole's duty to keep clear and the Transylvania's to keep her course," he said. "When I saw she was going to hit us I went full speed on the engines and had the helm put hard to starboard to swing the stern clear but it was too late. Fortunately the damage was not great. When the Creole was leaving her pier to go down the river we slowed down to let her get away and then signaled one blast to say we would pass on the port side, which she acknowledged. When we slowed down to pass two tows the Creole overhauled us and the collision took place."

The Transylvania had a pilot on board, but the bridge was in charge of Captain Boone. The pilot was there in an advisory capacity.

Coastwise vessels do not carry pilots. Captain B. G. Jacobs was on the bridge of the Creole. The Southern Pacific officials, who were reached at the pier, had no comment regarding the accident.

An extra crew of workers from the Robbins Drydock, Brooklyn, were sent to the Transylvania to cut away the torn railings and straighten out the plates temporarily. They finished their work at 7:30 P. M.

SENATORS SPEED TAX CUT MEASURE

Finance Committee Will Report Resolution Unanimously Tomorrow.

PASSAGE LIKELY IN WEEK

Tariff Bill Priority and Amendments Not Expected Long to Delay the Proposal.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—The $160,000,000 tax reduction resolution was approved in record time today by the Senate Committee on Finance. Chairman Smoot will report it to the Senate on Monday, and there is every reason to believe it will be the law of the land within a week or ten days.

Republican and Democratic leaders will act in the matter of temporarily laying aside the tariff bill. Some Senators want to take up the tax reduction measure Monday or Tuesday; others are inclined to wait a few days longer, or until the wool schedule of the tariff is disposed of. Either way, the signs are that the President will have the resolution in the form he suggested before the Christmas recess is voted.

The action of the Finance Committee was unanimous. For the first time in years a tax proposal of major importance was passed by the committee without opposition of any kind.

Senator Smoot said, and the Democratic spokesmen agree with him, that once the resolution becomes the unfinished business of the Senate its speedy passage is assured. Mr. Smoot said he did not expect debate on the bill to last more than three hours.

Watson for Acting Tomorrow.

Senator Watson, the majority leader, is in favor of taking up the tax resolution the first thing Monday, or, if that action is blocked, on Tuesday. With the overwhelming majority behind the measure, he takes the position there is no excuse for delay.

On the other hand, some Senators incline to the position that it would be the course of wisdom to finish the wool schedule and then pass the tax measure.

The Finance Committee, following approval of the resolution as it passed the House, made public a table prepared under the direction of Under-Secretary of the Treasury Mills, who appeared before the committee, showing what the proposed cut will mean to individual income taxpayers, of whom 2,440,000, by the last returns, will be affected.

Those with incomes of not more than $10,000 will be the beneficiaries of a tax reduction of $25,000,000, or a percentage of 55.56 per cent. There are 2,095,000 taxpayers listed in this class.

The tables from which these figures are taken, Mr. Mills said, cover the tax on dividends, capital gains, interest on government bonds, &c., less all tax credits, and is the estimated current individual income tax to be paid during 1929.

Proposed Taxes Tabulated.

The part of the table showing the number of taxpayers and the net total tax, with the percentage of each class, follows:

SURVEY SHOWS RISE IN RETAIL TRADE

Reports to National Chamber of Commerce Reveal Gain in Business Confidence.

MORE SALES IN MANY LINES

Lewis E. Pierson Advocates, in National Broadcast, Business Agency Like Federal Reserve.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Retail business is on the upgrade, due to holiday buying, the advent of cold weather and "more general confidence in the business outlook," according to reports now being analyzed by experts of the United States Chamber of Commerce, following the national business survey conference.

Not only is retail buying on the upgrade, but the "present outlook is for reasonable optimism," with holiday buying "off to a good start," the reports say. Cancellations show no rise from normal and employment in retail trade is holding up to normal. Delinquencies in installment accounts present no increase from normal.

The chief facts in the mass of data filed for business survey committees to be named next week by Julius H. Barnes, chairman of the chamber board, will begin to go out early next week to more than 900,000 business men.

Reporting on conditions in New York City, Alfred B. Koch, president of the National Retail Drygoods Association, said:

"Business conditions are fundamentally sound and there is no reason to believe that they will be materially or adversely affected. Department store sales for November are reported to be ahead of last year and we confidently expect a good holiday volume. Collections from outstanding charge accounts are running slightly better than the same period a year ago."

Denies Canceling of Orders.

"Holiday business is off to a good start and it is now generally believed that retail trade will be up to normal expectations. The distribution of Christmas savings funds to the extent of $600,000,000 is beginning to be felt in retail channels."

Mr. Koch denied reports that retailers were canceling merchandise orders. "During the past few days we have canvassed representative manufacturing sources for such lines as piece goods, women's, misses' and children's garments, housefurnishings, shoes, hosiery, custom jewelry, men's clothes and furnishings, gloves and toys, and we have not encountered a single instance where cancellations were reported to be above normal for this time of year," he said.

Laying off of temporary holiday season employes "should not be interpreted in the sense that merchants are reducing their forces in any other way than that which is resorted to in normal times," Mr. Koch added. He predicted that department store sales for the first six months of 1930 "will equal and perhaps surpass the retail volume for the corresponding period of 1929.

"The fulfillment of this prediction, however," he explained, "depends upon the stability of employment, the maintenance of wage schedules, the holding of inventories at a reasonable conservative level, as well as seasonable weather conditions."

Other Industries Optimistic.

The cloak and suit industry looks forward to an "even and encouragingly high level of demand," Isidore Grossman, president of the Industrial Council of Cloak, Suit and Shirt Manufacturers of New York City, reported. Nothing "remotely resembling a period of depression" had been encountered, and the in-

VARE TO RUN AGAIN FOR SENATE, HE SAYS ON WELCOME HOME

Will Enter Pennsylvania Primary in May to Win Seat Just Denied Him.

"CANDIDATE TO THE FINISH"

He Gives Out Pugnacious Statement as Throngs Hail Him at Philadelphia Station.

SHARP PARTY FIGHT LOOMS

Fisher, Delaying Appointment, Seeks Man, Possibly Grundy, Who Will Stay in Race.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 7.—William S. Vare, banished from the Senate at Washington yesterday after a three-year contest for admittance, will enter the primary campaign next May and fight for renomination and re-election.

Welcomed home by hundreds of fellow-townsmen who might have been cheering a returning conqueror instead of a man who has been rejected by the Senate on the ground that his credentials were tainted with fraud, Mr. Vare announced that he was a candidate "to the finish." Asked point blank whether he meant he would seek the Republican nomination next Spring, he said his statement "couldn't mean anything else."

Apparently without consulting any of his political associates, Mr. Vare drew up a statement on the train while returning to this city from Washington.

Sees State With Him.

"The sentiment of the entire community is with me in this fight, and I am a candidate to the finish," the statement read.

"Practically every paper in the country, and I have personally seen very many, even those that were against me in my previous campaign, is now with me in my defense of the Constitution and the right of the State to name its own Senators.

"I was given a clean bill of health by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

"Telegrams and other messages have come to me from every part of Pennsylvania, many of them from former opponents, saying I am stronger now than ever before. One man wired me that I had four friends now where previously I had but one.

"I shall fight with all the vigor that is within me to vindicate the right of my State to select its Senator and to preserve for all time the integrity of the Constitution of my country."

Mr. Vare's decision to campaign again for the Senate seat was communicated rapidly through the crowd gathered to welcome him at Broad Street Station. Many of his stanch political lieutenants rushed up to give quick approval to his announcement, but what effect it would have on the situation confronting Governor Fisher and his advisers was still a matter for wide speculation.

The Governor had announced that he would lose little time in designating a Senator, now that Mr. Vare had been rejected and William B. Wilson, the Democratic candidate, was declared not elected.

Governor Fisher Silent.

Although the belief persisted that Governor Fisher had determined to offer the Senatorship to Joseph R. Grundy, president of the Pennsylvania Manufacturers' Association, it was predicted in some quarters that

MARINES FIGHTING IN HAITI; CRUISER IS RUSHED THERE; HOOVER CALLS FOR INQUIRY

Rockefeller Sr. Nearly Gets Hole in 1 With Long Drive

By The Associated Press.

ORMOND BEACH, Fla., Dec. 7.—John D. Rockefeller Sr. almost made a hole in one today in his first golf game of the Winter season here.

Making a long drive from the eighth tee at the Ormond Beach course, the 90-year-old player threw his club in the air and danced like a schoolboy when he found his ball had come to a stop only two feet from the pin.

"Gee, wasn't that a wonderful drive," he exclaimed. "I am proud of that."

He was playing a foursome with Mrs. Walter T. Bovart of Washington, Neil Young of Murray Bay, Canada, and D. C. Stewart of Detroit.

MARINES KILL FIVE IN HAITIAN ATTACK

Wound Twenty in Repulsing a Charge of 1,500 Outside City of Aux Cayes.

ONE AMERICAN INJURED

Evidence of Smuggling of Arms Found at Jacmel—Peasant Thrust Feared There.

By The Associated Press.

PORT AU PRINCE, Haiti, Dec. 7.—With dramatic swiftness the apparently tranquil situation throughout the Republic of Haiti was shattered yesterday afternoon by the first bloodshed in the repulse of a band of 1,500 Haitians from the interior, who charged a marine patrol on the outskirts of the city of Aux Cayes.

In the encounter five Haitians were killed and twenty wounded. One marine was hurt in a hand-to-hand encounter with the leader of the band.

Aux Cayes was reported quiet today, but in great fear of a further attempt at an invasion. The local magistrate asserted that the repulse of the band had probably saved the city from looting, as an old enmity still exists between the cities and the peasants in the outlying districts.

Arms Smuggled at Jacmel.

In addition to the clash near Aux Cayes, it was discovered that there was evidence in the city of Jacmel indicating an extensive smuggling of arms was in progress. The remainder of the country was reported quiet.

First intimation of trouble near Aux Cayes came when the magistrate reported to Captain Roy Swink, district commander, that the countryside was in open revolt and that a band which he estimated at 150 was marching on the city. A marine patrol, with the National Guard, protecting the barracks and city, moved out but returned without incident.

At 4 o'clock in the afternoon a patrol of twenty marines armed with one machine gun, six automatic rifles and regular army rifles under Captain Swink, Haitian National Guard officer and Lieutenant John Blanchard of the marines established contact with the band near the entrance of the city. The band de-

SENDS CONGRESS MESSAGE

$50,000 Appropriation Is Asked for Commission to Study Problem.

HOLDS SOLUTION OBSCURE

President Seeks "Some More Definite Policy Than at Present."

PORTER MOVES FOR ACTION

Borah Calls the Conditions on the Island Intolerable, Backing Request.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Coincident with the receipt of an official report that five Haitians had been killed and twenty wounded in a clash with marines at Aux Cayes, the dispatch of 500 marine reinforcements to Port au Prince and the sailing of the cruiser Galveston from Guantanamo to Jacmel, Haiti, President Hoover today sent a special message to Congress asking an appropriation of $50,000 for a commission to investigate conditions and recommend some more definite policy for the United States toward the island republic.

The President informed Congress that the marine reinforcements were being sent at the request of Brig. Gen. John H. Russell, American High Commissioner at Port au Prince, who for days has been confronted with political and labor disorders of a widespread character menacing to Americans in Haiti.

Secretary Stimson admitted that the situation was bad and distressing. It had apparently long been developing, he said, and the present outbreaks had served to precipitate the action contemplated by the President and first announced in his annual message to Congress last Tuesday of having the entire problem of American supervision of Haiti under the treaty of 1915 investigated by a special commission.

In his special message to Congress today Mr. Hoover said he intended to name members of both the House and the Senate on the commission.

Attacks on Policy Expected.

Notwithstanding this assurance, the appropriation will probably not be voted without criticism of American policy in Haiti in recent years. Progressives, such as Senator Blaine of Wisconsin, and Democrats, such as Senator Wheeler of Montana, may attack this policy and particularly the assertion of President Hoover in his special message that "our representatives in Haiti have shown great ability and devotion."

In addition, Representative Garner of Texas, the Democratic floor leader in the House, said his party would attack the request of the President on the ground that it was for "another commission" that was being sought to usurp the duties of Congress.

It is expected that the application will be granted, although action is not promised before late next week. The Senate was not in session today, but in the House a joint resolution was immediately introduced by Representative Porter of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, to carry out the President's request. It read:

House Joint Resolution.

Providing for a commission to study and review the policies of the United States in Haiti.

Introduced by Mr. Porter, Dec. 7, 1929.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled, That the President is authorized to appoint a commission to study and review the policies of the United States in Haiti and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the expenses of such a commission, including expenses of said commission in Haiti and in the United States, compensation of employes, travel and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), stenographic and other services by contract if deemed necessary, rent of office in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, purchase of necessary books and documents, printing and binding, official cards and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, $50,000.

Action on the resolution is not likely in the House before next Thurs-

Mrs. W. P. Trimble, Trapped in Auto, Drowns In Seattle; Rest of New York Family Escape

By The Associated Press.

SEATTLE, Dec. 7.—Trapped in a closed car which plunged off a dock into Elliott Bay, Mrs. William Pitt Trimble of New York was drowned late today. The harbor patrol tried frantically to bring the machine to the surface.

Her husband, who has large Seattle interests, and son, William Pitt Trimble Jr., managed to get out of windows of the machine when it came to a halt at a depth of thirty feet and escaped after a vain effort to rescue the woman. Another son, Lieutenant Ford Trimble, who was standing by the car adjusting the motor, was carried into the water when it suddenly plunged through a guard rail, but he also escaped.

His brother, who was at the wheel of the machine, had stepped on the starter while the car was apparently in gear, sending it leaping toward the water.

The woman's form could be seen propped in the back seat as rescue workers grappled with the machine.

Mrs. Trimble, who was the former Miss Cannie W. Ford, and Mr. Trimble are listed in the Social Register as living at 850 Park Avenue. The family left for the Pacific Coast last week. Mrs. Trimble was a member of the Colony Club and the National Society of Colonial Dames. Mr. Trimble is a member of the Army and Navy Club. Miss Augusta W. Trimble is a member of the Colony Club and the Junior League. Lieutenant Ford Trimble was graduated from West Point in 1920.

Seven Bandits Hold Up 50 at Dinner to Vitale; Escape With Thousands of Dollars' Loot

Interrupting a speech by Magistrate Albert H. Vitale in which he was thanking a group of fifty business men for tendering him a dinner on the occasion of his return from a vacation, seven gunmen burst into a private dining room in the Roman Gardens at 187th Street and Southern Boulevard, the Bronx, at 1:30 A. M. today and robbed the magistrate and his fifty hosts of several thousand dollars worth of jewelry and cash. The seven men escaped in waiting automobiles.

How much money was taken from Magistrate Vitale could not be learned during the excitement following the departure of the gunmen. Among the victims, most of whom were Bronx business and professional man, was former Magistrate Michael Delargi.

A small army of detectives and patrolmen were summoned to the scene and at once began to comb the district. It was believed that the gang might have dashed through the Bronx Park, which is nearby, in fleeing from the scene.

Magistrate Vitale was being feted by his friends in a room on the second floor of the restaurant. All of the diners were taken by surprise when the seven men suddenly walked into the dining room and ordered every one to keep quiet and submit to being relieved of their valuables and cash.

Before departing the men also stopped at the cashier's desk, where they obtained $87 in cash.

Word was flashed to the Bronx Park police station and detectives under Captain Charles Nelson, who obtained a good description of the robbers, started on the man-hunt at once. They said they were hopeful of making an arrest soon.

day or Friday as the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which it was referred, will not be constituted before that time, due to the complication caused in the Republican assignments by the death of Representative Greist, dean of the Pennsylvania delegation in the House.

Another resolution to the same effect was introduced yesterday by Representative Fish of New York.

It was explained at his offices that his resolution was prepared yesterday before he left for New York, where he was today.

Senator Borah, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, described the Haitian situation today as one of "widespread and bitter unrest," the result, he said, "of oppressive and cruel acts on the part of the governing authorities." Present conditions, he declared, have reached the intolerable stage. The committee will take up the President's request for the sending of another commission to the island on Monday. Just what line the committee action will take, Senator Borah did not say.

"The immediate disturbance in Haiti is," said Senator Borah," symptomatic of the widespread and bitter unrest. The oppression and the cruelty of the government of Haiti is something beyond the power of language to describe, something you would not suppose could take place anywhere in the day and age.

"It does seem to me that if we are going to stay in Haiti the least we could do is to compel the government of Haiti to be just and merciful toward these unfortunate people. If there is a program as indicated in the President's message for cleaning up this situation, I want to help, for present conditions are intolerable."

King Backs President.

Senator King, Democrat, of Utah, who was a member of the Senate Committee that went to Haiti five years ago to study conditions there, said he would support the President.

"The situation in Haiti," said Senator King, "despite the assurances of President Borno and others has been and still is far from satisfactory. The people resent American occupation and no matter how long we maintain our marines in Haiti there will be continuing resentment which will be a handicap in the proper development of the country. I shall support the recommendations of the President."

Secretary Stimson contended that the situation was very complex and one inherited from previous administrations. The desire of the President, he added, is for an investigation so as to assure in the future that American policy toward Haiti will not be haphazard. In this investigation it is desired, he said, that the whole government participate and that Congress shall share the responsibility with the Executive.

Mr. Stimson reiterated that the government was supporting strongly General Russell and commended the marines for their "forbearance" in the clash at Aux Cayes.

Two reports were received by the State Department today from General Russell. The first was dispatched at 8 o'clock last night and gave satisfactory assurances as to the immediate situation, with General Russell deciding that marine reinforcements were not necessary. Four hours later he had received word of the clash at Aux Cayes and again asked for marine reinforcements. They had already left for Hampton Roads.

Strike at Aux Cayes Called Off.

The message sent at 8 o'clock last night was summarized by the State Department as follows:

"At Aux Cayes with the arrival of the detachment of marines at 10 o'clock the night of Dec. 6 the situation quickly cleared up. The American women and children who had taken refuge in the Garde Compound on the edge of the town returned to their homes and order was immediately restored.

"Conditions were stabilizing throughout the country as the effect of the measures taken by the brigade commander. The public works service which was scheduled to strike on Dec. 5 decided not to strike, and since law and order at Port au Prince has been established men were applying in excess for positions at the Custom House.

"On Dec. 5, press telegrams concerning the comment of the Department of State that this government was gratified at the declaration of President Borno that he will not be a candidate for the Presidential election of April, 1930, were received and published in Haiti. The receipt of this information in Haiti had an excellent effect.

"Members of the Haitian press on Dec. 5 stated they had no feeling or complaint against the United States forces and, furthermore, that they realized that one thing had led to another and the strike had rapidly developed a situation the gravity of which had not been foreseen.

"In view of the present condition and the placing of the Galveston at his disposal, Commissioner Russell felt that an increase of strength of the brigade was not necessary and that it was his intention to have the marines withdrawn from Aux Cayes immediately upon the stabilization of conditions and he had instructed the brigade commander accordingly."

At midnight last night General Russell sent his more alarming report, with its word of the encounter between marines and natives at Aux Cayes. It was summarized by the State Department as follows:

"The department has been informed by Brig. Gen. John H. Russell, American High Commissioner at Haiti, that information was received on Dec. 6 by the garde commander at Cayes that a mob was moving on the city. On that date the garde guarded the city, while marines were at garde barracks at the entrance to the town. Marines sent by patrol with garde commander out to meet advancing mob about 200 yards from the barracks.

"Leaders of a mob of about 1,500 demanded to enter the city to assist the strikers. They were told the strikers were back at work, but as they would not believe Captain Swink the leaders were allowed to pass through the line, enter the town and confer with strike leaders. They returned later and demanded the release of three prisoners; otherwise they should advance on the town. Their request being refused, they advanced down the road toward the patrol and through the cane fields on each side of the road.

"The patrol of twenty marines fired over their heads and the mob halted, but after half an hour again advanced. The patrol fired again over the mob, but when the mob closed in with a rush, and at least one leader was in the midst of the patrol, the patrol fired into the mob, killing five and wounding twenty.

"All reports are to the effect that the patrol exercised great forbearance, as it was being constantly stoned and the mob was in an ugly mood. Effective fire was not employed until necessary in self-defense.

"The mob dispersed and all is now quiet at Cayes.

"Commissioner Russell has arranged for the evacuation of women and children from Aux Cayes today by steamer.

"At Jacmel papers have been seized showing that many automatic pistols had come into the country from Guatemala.

"It is rumored that the country people around Jacmel are in revolt. The Garde commander has sent fifty men to Jacmel.

"The telephone line from Gobedere to Jacmel was cut, as well as the line from Gonaives to Grosmorne.

"Commissioner Russell has requested that the Galveston proceed immediately to Jacmel.

"The commissioner concluded his telegram by stating that it is apparent that the opposition press and the agitators have inflamed the country, and as the situation is not clearing up as rapidly as he had hoped he suggested that reinforcements be sent."

The enlisted men of the marine reinforcements were taken from the base at Quantico, Va., and Parris Island, S. C., and organized as a provisional battalion in command of Major Louis E. Fagan, who was in charge of the marine recruiting office at Philadelphia. The force consists of twenty-one marine officers, two medical officers of the navy, one marine gunner and 469 enlisted men.

Sails From Hampton Roads.

It sailed this afternoon from Hampton Roads, Va., on the U. S. S. Wright, aircraft tender and flagship of the aircraft squadron of the scouting fleet, and is due at Port au Prince on Tuesday. The Wright is under the command of Captain R. F. Zogbaum.

The Galveston, a second-line cruiser attached to the special service squadron in Central American waters, was at Guantanamo when it was ordered to the scene and left immediately, being due tonight or tomorrow at Jacmel, on the south coast of Haiti, approximately sixty miles west of Aux Cayes and twenty-five miles southwest of Port au Prince by the overland route. The Galveston is in command of Captain R. P. Craft and has a complement of 300 officers and enlisted men of the navy as well as a company of fifty marines.

The permanent force of marines in Haiti numbers 700, most of them being in a brigade and the rest in charge of the native constabulary.

With the disposition of these forces it is believed that Americans will be safe against violence. Latest reports to the State Department indicated that there were about 300 American civilians in Haiti, 200 of whom are at Port au Prince and about 25 at Aux Cayes. The rest are scattered through the country, with approximately 50 in the northern area.

Secretary Stimson said today that the first responsibility for maintaining order devolved upon the native constabulary of 2,000 officers and men. The American forces, he added, were considered reserves and a background to support the native forces, which are officered by marines above the grade of Second Lieutenant.

Stressed Confidence in Americans.

Attention was called today to the fact that Commissioner Russell's seventh annual report, for the year 1928, made public last January, emphasized the confidence of the Haitian people in the American administration. After referring to the cyclone, floods and consequent destruction wrought in Haiti last year, the commissioner's report says:

"In spite of the above tragic episodes, the general reconstruction work has made decided progress, due to the fact that the Haitian organizations placed under the direction of treaty officials have assiduously continued their work. As a result of their efforts the general improvement throughout the entire country is most marked. The mass of the Haitian people has been materially benefited, and the Haitian Government has been placed upon a more stable basis.

"It is particularly worthy of note that the ignorant peasant no longer looks upon the intervention with distrust, but now rather regards it as a friend."

Secretary of the Navy Adams in his annual report, made public today, says:

"The mission of the First Brigade, Marine Corps, in Haiti has undergone no change during the year. Intercourse with the Haitian people becomes increasingly cordial and very little friction manifests itself."

Watson Blames Military Rule.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP).—Senator Watson of Indiana, the Republican leader, said today he thought the disturbed situation in Haiti arose from the fact that the island was under military rule, and suggested a transfer to civilian administration.

He approved President Hoover's suggestion to send a commission to investigate the situation.

"I believe it would recommend civilian control," he added.

Called From Brooklyn Navy Yard.

Captain J. N. Popham of the Marine Corps was summoned from the Brooklyn Navy Yard to join the marine contingent that left Norfolk for Haiti yesterday, it was learned from Colonel Greene, commanding officer of the marines at the Brooklyn yard. Colonel Greene said he had received no further advices from Washington, but was keeping the 200 marines at the yard in readiness.

Captain Paul Dongan, manager of the navy yard, reported yesterday that he had received no orders from Washington concerning any of the twenty-six ships now at the base. Colonel Graham of the army base at Fort Hamilton, Brooklyn, likewise denied having received word from the War Department regarding either men or supplies.

TEXT OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—The text of President Hoover's message to Congress today on the Haitian situation follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my message to Congress of the 3rd instant I indicated my concern as to the future of our policies in Haiti. I stated that we have there about 700 marines, and that we are confronted with a difficult problem, the solution of which is still obscure. I further stated that if Congress approves I shall dispatch a commission to Haiti to review and study the matter in an endeavor to arrive at some more definite policy than at present.

Our representatives in Haiti have shown great ability and devotion and have accomplished signal results in improvement of the material condition of that people. Yet our experience has revealed more clearly than was seen at first the difficulties of the problem, and the entire situation should be reviewed in the light of this experience.

Since the dispatch of my message disturbances in Haiti emphasize the importance of such an investigation and determination of national policies in the immediate future.

The students at the agricultural school at Damien went on a strike on Oct. 31 as a protest against a new policy of the Haitian Government. The Haitian Government had heretofore allotted $10,000 per annum to this school for scholarships but this year it withheld $2,000 of the appropriation in order to make it possible for needy students to perform practical school work on the grounds. Sympathetic strikes were subsequently declared in the medical and law schools.

President Borno appointed a committee of Haitians to look into the matter and it seemed probable at the time that recommendations presented by this committee and accepted by the authorities would adjust the difficulty. Unfortunately, advantage was taken of the situation by various agencies to foment disturbances against the Haitian Administration and on Dec. 3 the American High Commissioner reported that the strike movement had spread throughout the country and that it was feared that the Haitian employes of the departments under American treaty officials might become involved.

On Dec. 4 Custom House employes at Port-au-Prince abandoned their work in a disorderly manner and crowds have gathered there in Port-au-Prince. At the same time there were reported demonstrations by crowds at Cape Haitien in sympathy with the disturbance in Port-au-Prince. The American High Commissioner reported that on the morning of Dec. 4 it was feared that disorderly conduct would arise at Aux Cayes and similar disturbances were possible at other places.

The High Commissioner has asked that additional marines be in readiness to make sure that if the situation becomes serious American lives will be protected, and the force he has suggested has been ordered dispatched for that purpose.

I feel that it is most desirable that the commission mentioned in my message of Dec. 3 be constituted and sent to Haiti without delay and I, therefore, request the Congress to authorize the immediate sending of such a commission and to appropriate for this purpose $50,000. It is my intention to include one or two members from each House of Congress on this commission.

NEGRO GROUP CHARGES OPPRESSION IN HAITI

Association for Advancement of Colored People Calls Freedom of Press There "Mockery."

A series of charges against the American administration of Haiti, which was characterized as "fourteen years of incompetence, misrule and oppression of the natives by the American occupation," were issued yesterday by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

These were based on a survey by Perceval Thoby, former Chargé d'Affaires of the Haitian delegation at Washington, who is said to have submitted his findings to the Department of State about a month ago.

The association charges that Louis Borno, President of Haiti, was elected in 1922 "in contemptuous contravention of the Constitution," and that his continuance in office "has been possible only through the support of the United States High Commissioner."

Freedom of the press is termed "a hollow mockery," and forty journalists are said by the association to have been imprisoned, "several of these having remained, for months without trial, in the penitentiary."

The present Constitution was forced upon the country, Mr. Thoby charged, and he added that repeated voting of government employes was used to pass a new series of amendments.

"Commercially, Haiti is in a state of rapid decline," Mr. Thoby reported. "The people, impoverished, have lost their purchasing power. In the leading banks of Port au Prince drafts amounting to approximately $1,000,000 remain unpaid. The Haitian budget system has been destroyed. There are no longer detailed accounts either of estimates or expenditures, the allocations being presented in lump sums."

An impartial commission of United States citizens, including negroes, to investigate and report publicly on the conditions in Haiti was urged by the association.

To judge by Port au Prince native newspapers—printed in French with some columns in Haitian—and by pamphlets, circulars, bulletins, all full of revolutionary propaganda, all posted at the Port au Prince post-office and reaching here freely through the United States mails, the freedom of the press in Haiti could hardly be termed "a hollow mockery."

In all these publications, alleged grievances are put forward. Most of the complaints—national economics and industry—are expressed in general terms. Editorial articles in La Presse have emphasized the "glorious days of the rule of the French" prior to 1804, and have printed documents both in French and Haitian expounding the beneficial régime of Napoleonic France.

SENDS 2 PLANES TO HAITI.

Navy Dispatches Marine Craft From Quantico via Miami.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP).—The Navy Department today dispatched two Marine airplanes from Quantico, Va., to Port-au-Prince, Haiti.

The airplanes, which are amphibians, left during the afternoon for Miami, Fla., where they were scheduled to arrive tonight, and are to fly to Haiti tomorrow.

All available equipment of the Pan American Airways, Inc., was offered to President Hoover yesterday for the transportation of marines to Haiti should the need develop.

J. T. Trippe, president of Pan American Airways, said in a telegram to the President:

"From press dispatches I note you may decide the situation in Haiti warrants dispatching additional marines. In view of this situation it may be desirable for staff officers, special observers, or other government officials to reach Haiti as quickly as possible. Should it become desirable to move a large number of personnel, Pan American Airways has twenty multi-engined transports each capable of transporting twelve persons, based at Miami, which could be made available for this purpose at short notice. Port au Prince can be reached in one day's flight from Miami. We consider it a privilege to place this equipment at the disposal of the government should it be required."

MARINES IN HAITI SINCE 1915 REVOLT

Restored Order After Killing of President Sam, Crushing New Rebellion in 1919.

BORNO HELD PRO-AMERICAN

Our Officials Practically Carry on Government—15 of Republic's 25 Presidents Driven Out.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—American marines have been in Haiti since July 28, 1915, when Admiral Caperton not only restored order after the butchery of President Sam but assisted in the re-establishment of the Haitian Government and the election of a President.

There were two candidates to succeed President Sam—M. Dartiguenave and Dr. Bobo. The Navy Department preferred the former and he was elected by the National Assembly, viva voce, on Aug. 7.

Two days after the election the State Department declared that it would recognize M. Dartiguenave only after the Haitian Congress had authorized the President to sign a treaty granting the United States control over the customs and the gendarmerie. Admiral Caperton seized the customs house. President Dartiguenave gave in in September, but the Haitian Congress protested. Eventually, later in September, a convention was signed.

A "caco" revolt involving 5,000 natives broke out in 1919 under the leadership of Charlemagne Peralte. When the Haitian gendarmerie proved unable to suppress this revolt the Marine Corps was called in. In October of that year American marines in the Haitian gendarmerie disguised themselves and shot and killed Charlemagne. The revolt was quelled, the Haitians declaring that 3,500 had been killed during it. The Senate investigating committee which looked into the matter put the number at 1,500. About twelve or fifteen marines met their death.

Borno Succeeded Dartiguenave.

President Dartiguenave's term ended in 1922, whereupon the Council of State selected Louis Borno as President. With this choice, it is stated, the opposition of the Haitian Government to the demands of the American authorities came to an end.

American authority in Haiti now consists of an American High Commissioner, General John H. Russell, five American treaty officials and about 200 other marine and naval officers and civilians. While under the treaty of 1915 the American officials were ostensibly to serve as "advisers" to the Haitian Government, actual responsibility for the administration of practically every department in the local government, except justice and literary education, has been concentrated in the hands of these Americans.

Moreover, during the American occupation all popular control over the Haitian President has been abolished. The Haitian Legislature has been supplanted by the Council of State, a body composed of twenty-one members appointed by the President, with power to adopt legislation and to elect the President. No elections for the Haitian Parliament have been held since 1917.

President Borno, critics allege, has been kept in power by the American occupation and in return "loyally cooperates" with the United States.

Proposals for Future.

Many proposals have been made regarding the future of Haiti. Principal among them are the immediate termination of the 1915 treaty and the withdrawal of American officials; continuation of the present policy until 1936, when American control should be withdrawn; continuation of American occupation until 1936, with drastic changes in policy to fit Haitians to govern themselves upon the withdrawal of the United States, and indefinite occupation of Haiti by the United States and the authorization of continued occupation by the negotiation of a new treaty in 1936.

The National Geographic Society in a bulletin today described the Island of Haiti as blessed by nature "with unstinted wealth," and pictured its stormy political history, which continued virtually from the sixteenth century until the marines landed in 1915.

"Of the twenty-five Presidents who held office in Haiti from the founding of the republic to 1830, fifteen were driven out of office by revolutions, of whom thirteen were banished to foreign lands, while two were allowed to remain in Haiti to die, which they did quite promptly," the bulletin said.

One Lived to Old Age.

"Three died violent deaths in office at the hands of assassins.

"Three more died while in office from cause or causes unexplained.

"One died of wounds received from revolutionists, and one, by committing suicide, disappointed a successful rival, who had planned to make his death a national festival.

"One of the twenty-five, who must have been a remarkable man, finished his term and retired from office alive and well, to live to a respectable age and die in peace in his bed!

"Thus the procession of Presidents passed. Every new President was hailed as a savior and every ex-President execrated as a monster—usually with too much truth. Presidents Soulouque and Salnave were generally admitted cannibals.

"After 1903 the open season on Presidents became more open than ever and the procession of revolutions speeded up considerably, the events occurring which brought about the landing of the American forces in 1915."

TOP MAYFLOWER BID MADE BY FLORIDA LINE

New Yorkers Are Second, but All Offers for the Presidential Yacht Are Rejected.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—New York City interests failed in their effort to purchase the former Presidential yacht Mayflower and present it to the metropolis for use as a harbor reception craft in place of the Macom when bids for the vessel were received at the Navy Department today. All bids were rejected as inadequate.

Two offers were received from New York interests, but were not the high ones. The leading bid came from the Florida Railroad and Navigation Corporation of Tampa for $51,000. William F. Carey of New York City offered $31,000 and James A. Kenny and Richard S. Cors of New York City $17,017.

Other bids were $15,776 from the Boston Iron and Metal Company of Baltimore and $16,250 from John W. Hubbard of Pittsburgh.

Which New York bid represented the group contemplating giving the yacht to the city was not disclosed. On Oct. 31, bids were first opened for sale of the Mayflower, but the highest one at that time was $2,000 short of the lowest one received today. Whether new bids will be invited is yet to be determined by Secretary Adams.

While under the impression yesterday that his company's bid for the Mayflower had been successful, Barron G. Collier, president of the Florida Railroad and Navigation Corporation, offered to turn the yacht over to the city of New York for the amount of his bid, $51,000.

Police Commissioner Whalen telephoned Mr. Collier and soon afterward the latter announced that he and George T. Linton, vice president of the navigation company, would meet Mr. Whalen tomorrow and "do anything to convey our interest in the vessel to him."

Mr. Whalen had told Mr. Collier of his disappointment over the city's failure to get the vessel and Mr. Collier had replied that he had no wish to oppose the city in the matter, but had not taken seriously the reports that the city wanted to buy the yacht. Mr. Collier said his company had wanted to buy the vessel to replace the Princess Montague, now adrift off Nassau, where it was torn from its pier and dashed against the rocks by the recent hurricane in the Bahamas.

NEW YORK ARCHITECTS WIN CHICAGO AWARD

Gugler and Bailey Get $20,000 Prize for Best Design for a War Memorial.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Dec. 7.—Eric Gugler and Roger Bailey, associated architects of New York City, are winners of the first prize of $20,000 in the architectural competition for a war memorial on the lake front, sponsored by a committee of civic and business leaders.

A second prize of $5,000 was awarded to Benjamin H. Marshall, Chicago architect.

The purpose of the committee was to obtain a design for a memorial which, when built, "will adequately memorialize the sacrifices and services of all who served in the World War, and in a manner relating not inharmoniously to the adjacent architectural and landscape elements of Grant Park and the yacht harbor."

The winning design is a plain, dignified structure, making use of the open peristyle effect. It is square and boxlike in outline. The memorial will rise several hundred feet above the lake front on filled-in land, at the foot of Congress Street, opposite the Buckingham memorial fountain.

Drooping shrubbery will decorate various terraces on all sides of the structure.

ANMUTH CHAIN RAISES PAY.

10 Per Cent Increase Granted in Response to Hoover Appeal.

Following the recent example of Henry Ford, Philip Anmuth, president of the Anmuth Stores Corporation, 875 Sixth Avenue, operators of a chain of clothing stores in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, announced yesterday that he had increased by 10 per cent the salaries of all store employes except those of the managers, who will receive 10 per cent of their stores' profits, or about $1,000 each on the average. The increases were made effective as of Dec. 1.

In his letter to the managers, Mr. Anmuth said:

"Regarding President Hoover's recent appeal to boost business, I have decided to do my bit in helping to improve conditions. I have adopted Mr. Ford's plan to increase salaries. I sincerely hope that every American business man will favor this idea and also increase employes' salaries. Through this act, the entire country will prosper and in turn the merchants will gain by the country's prosperity."

manded that they be permitted to enter the city to join strikers there, and when told that the strike was over and the city back at work they demanded that two leaders enter it to determine the facts.

This was permitted, but when the leaders returned and confirmed the news that the strike was over the band greeted the information with curses and jeers.

The reports from Aux Cayes said the band, the total number of which by this time was estimated at 1,500, advanced on the marines, throwing stones and surrounding the patrol. The marines fired three volleys at intervals over the heads of the advancing men, but this failed to stop them. The position of the marines was then described as precarious.

Captain Swink finally opened fire and approximately 250 rounds of effective shots scattered the band in all directions. From the first contact and challenge to the firing of the machine guns and automatic rifles a full hour is said to have elapsed.

The Haitians were not armed with rifles, but carried clubs, machetes and stones.

Strike Leaders Have Arms.

Reports from Jacmel said that the disquieting situation broke swiftly yesterday afternoon. Captain Hal Potter, district commander, found that five strike leaders whom he had arrested on charges of intimidating laborers at the customs on Thursday were armed with new automatic pistols.

A search yesterday unearthed a large number of papers in French, Spanish and German, apparently orders for pistols and rifles from Hamburg, Germany. Several names were contained in the papers, but most of them were indecipherable.

Airplanes brought the papers immediately to Port au Prince and reinforcements of two National Guard officers and fifty-two men were sent by truck to Jacmel, which they reached at 2:30 A. M.

The authorities at Jacmel have been ordered to make wholesale arrests, if conditions warrant it.

Reports have been received there that the peasants may attack the town, which is at present under effective control.

First offenders under the Port au Prince curfew ruling, which is part of the martial law, were released this morning with a warning that a second offense would bring them before the provost court.

A plane was sent to Jeremie in the south when telegraphic communication was lost and the wires were also out between Gonaives and Port de Paix.

The attacks on Aux Cayes were considered the result of active anti-government propaganda which began in the south five months ago. Agents were reported to have circulated rumors that the government would forbid cultivation and sale of coffee, tobacco and other crops and would impose heavy taxes.

Peasants Even Feared Smoking.

These rumors gained such headway that in authenticated instances the peasants stopped planting or destroyed already growing coffee bushes and tobacco plants and appeared even afraid to smoke in public for fear of arrest. Government agencies took prompt steps to reassure the countryside and the situation improved materially.

The agitation was again renewed, with alarmist reports based on the passage of new alcohol and tobacco tax bills, following passage of a coffee standardization law designed to improve the quality and cleanliness of coffee shipments.

The south is the centre of the coffee trade, which constitutes 75 per cent of the Haitian revenues.

Three general factors appear to lie behind the agitation which appeared first with the student strike of Nov. 30. The campaign seemed to be first directed toward inducing President Borno to call general legislative elections in February. His failure to do so led to a drive to prevent his reelection to a third term as unconstitutional. His declaration two weeks ago that he was not a candidate was not accepted without equivocation.

The third factor was apparently a desire to force an American Congressional investigation with the object of compelling withdrawal of American forces before the expiration of the treaty in 1936.

The United States State Department message to President Borno congratulating him on his decision not to be a candidate arrived on the day following the strike by the customs employes and the riots here. It is possible that if the message had arrived a few days before it might have reassured the public.

The steamer Martinique tonight was en route here with American families whose evacuation from Cayes Province had been ordered by Commissioner Russell. Most of the persons on the Martinique are relatives of marine corps and naval officers and other American Government employes. The men remain at their posts.

AGA KHAN MARRIES FORMER SHOPGIRL

Indian Moslem Potentate Wed to Frenchwoman by Mayor at Aix-les-Bains.

IMAMS FROM PARIS ASSIST

Read Marriage Rites in Town Hall for Religious Ruler—He Gives Bride Diamond and Estate.

By P. J. PHILIP.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

AIX-LES-BAINS, France, Dec. 7.—It sounds like a tale of Scheherezade, but in reality it was entirely Occidental and up-to-date. This morning in the Town Hall here, before the Mayor with his tri-colored sash round his waist, Andrée Carron, former candy salesgirl and until recently a partner with her sister in a modiste's shop in Paris, was married to his Highness, the Sultan Sir Mahomed Shah, the Aga Khan, Knight of the British Empire, sportsman, spiritual head of the great sect of Khojahs and millionaire leader of Indian Mohammedans.

All over India and East Africa the subjects of Aga Khan pray daily for him, and water from his bath is holy water, a drop of which they believe can cure their ills. In Europe this potentate has entry everywhere. His colors figure on every race course, and wherever society gathers the Aga Khan is to be seen. In Indian councils his word is the word of millions of people. As his first wife he married an Italian Princess.

Now a widower, he has married again and his wife is a girl of the French commercial class, the daughter of a man who directs a Paris hotel and who herself has always worked for a living. But she comes from this country of Savoy, which for years past has been her husband's favorite resort. She is handsome, tall and forthright in her speech and ways.

"I am 31," she told newspaper men when they wanted to make a romance out of her engagement. "Twenty years younger than my husband, but no child.

On this wedding morning at 7 o'clock she attended mass at the Cathedral, and although she is marrying the great leader of another religion, she has no intention of changing her own. But her marriage was a civil one, Mayor Henri Clerc reading the contract and delivering a short admonition as he wished happiness to the wedded pair. Beside him, a curious sight in a French town hall stood Si Ali Yayahjaoul and Si Bel Ihassen, two imams from the Paris Mosque, who read the marriage rite and delivered a short prayer so that the Aga Khan should be well and truly married in his own religion.

The bride was gowned in green velvet with ivory lace and cape lined with vison. Her husband's gifts to her were a huge square-cut diamond of historic associations and enormous value and an estate near her birthplace, Chambery. There the Aga Khan has bought a great stretch of land with wonderful views across lake and mountain and there he plans to build a villa for his bride and to make his European home with her.

Only the witnesses, the Mayor and the bride's father and sister were present at the wedding breakfast, which had been chosen by the bridegroom, who has a weakness for French cooking. Afterward the Aga Khan and his wife, whose proper title and married name no one seems to know clearly, left for the Riviera and Italy, where they will spend their honeymoon.

ARMY'S AID SOUGHT TO SEARCH FOR EIELSON

Wilbur Suggests Expedition to Look for Lost Flier in Alaska or Siberia.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP).—Secretary Wilbur suggested today to the War Department that active steps be taken for an army expedition to seek to rescue Lieutenant Ben Eielson and his mechanic, Earl Borland, somewhere in northern Alaska or on the Siberian coast.

The action of Secretary Wilbur followed the receipt of a telegram from six leading citizens of Nome, Alaska, informing him that the private expedition headed by Frank Dorbandt had been unable to function and that Dorbandt had cracked up his plane at Teller, Alaska.

Charles D. Jones, United States Marshal at Nome, informed the Interior Department that the planes available in Alaksa for the Eielson search were unsuited for such work. He urged that the government give assistance to the search with planes suitable for long cruising.

Eielson has been missing since early in November when he made his second trip from Teller to North Cape, Siberia, where he had been engaged in removing passengers and a $1,000,000 fur cargo from the icebound trading ship Nunuk.

Graham B. Grosvenor, president of the Aviation Corporation, announced yesterday that he had requested the aid of the Air Corps in the search for Carl Ben Eielson in Alaska or near North Cape, Siberia.

Captain Ross Hoyt of the Air Corps, who recently made an attempt at a record round trip flight between New York and Nome, has been assigned to confer with the officials of the Aviation Corporation, and offers of assistance from the Navy Bureau of Aeronautics came by telephone from Langley Field, Va., from Commander John H. Towers, it was learned yesterday.

Mr. Grosvenor said that Captain Hoyt was expected to arrive in New York last night, and that other branches of the government air services would send planes to Teller immediately to aid in the search of the northern wastes.

Alaskan Airways pilots have suffered several accidents in landing and taking off during the search and have finally depleted their flying equipment so much that they are in dire need of outside aid if they hope to find the lost flier before he perishes, according to Mr. Grosvenor.

Frank Dorbandt and Joe Crosson, two of the pilots, have been searching for Eielson and his mechanic, Earl Borland, since Nov. 9, when the two were forced down on the way to North Cape. The two searchers have reached the Siberian coast several times in order to start an aerial search from that point, but have been held in enforced idleness both there and at Teller by a continuous blizzard and heavy Winter fogs.

In the dead Winter, flying in that section is practically at a standstill under unfavorable weather conditions and the siding planes of the government are to be sent so that the most can be made of any slight break in the weather, it was said.

COOLIDGE SILENT ON SENATORSHIP

Ex-President Refuses to Comment on New Report That He Will Run to Succeed Gillett.

NORTHAMPTON, Mass., Dec. 7 (AP).—Calvin Coolidge, former President, remained uncommunicative tonight regarding published reports that he would be a candidate for the United States Senate in 1930.

Mr. Coolidge's comment of "I have nothing further to say" was delivered by his secretary, who called attention to Mr. Coolidge's recent statement that "any reporter that wants to get a scoop may do so by denying any published rumors regarding my intentions."

The Boston Transcript today said that advices from an unimpeachable Washington source were to the effect that high officials close to the administration were trying to induce the former President to become a candidate for the Senate.

The Transcript said also that the administration officials were working in conjunction with prominent Massachusetts leaders in their efforts to gain his consent to seek the

The Senatorial situation as applying to Massachusetts has recently drawn considerable attention. Senator Frederick H. Gillett recently announced that he would retire when his term of office expired in 1931.

Former Governor Alvan T. Fuller was immediately pointed out as a possible successor. As yet Mr. Fuller has not announced his candidacy, although in a recent statement he said what he would do if he were a candidate.

SAYS STOCK CRASH ENDED PARTY MYTH

Prof. Rogers Asserts It Showed Republican Rule Is Not Synonymous With Prosperity.

The recent stock market slump should end forever the belief that prosperity is synonymous with a Republican Administration in Washington, Dr. Lindsey Rogers, Professor of Public Law at Columbia University, told members of the Southern Women's Democratic Organization in New York at its first open meeting of the season in the Plaza Hotel yesterday afternoon.

Statements linking prosperity with Republican rule, used so fluently by Republican campaign orators, are mere catch phrases which lack specification and the support of competent economists and statisticians, he declared. However, elections have proved, he said, that catch words have a considerable power in catching electorates and that the myth of a Republican monopoly of prosperity has overshadowed Republican records of corruption and malfeasance.

While the speaker placed no responsibility upon the Republicans or the administration for the break in stock prices, he declared that a careful analysis of the bull market probably would justify a severe criticism of former President Coolidge and Secretary Mellon for the reassuring statements issued periodically to keep stock prices up.

"Mr. Coolidge declared that the increase in brokers' loans was not alarming," the speaker continued. "This was the first occasion that a President of the United States made a statement on a subject as controversial, a subject on which, I claim, he was abysmally ignorant."

SCOPE OF COMMANDER BYRD'S LATEST EXPLORATION.

Territory eastward from 150 degrees comprises new area sighted, including mountains extending 150 miles southward along the 147th line of longitude from coastline into Marie Byrd Land. The lines of black arrows indicate the route of the flight to the South Pole and back.

BROADCAST PRAISE TO BYRD

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURGH, Pa., Dec. 7.—Hundreds of congratulatory messages from all over the world for Commander Byrd and members of his expedition at Little America, Antarctica, were broadcast tonight through the Westinghouse radio Station KDKA.

[Many of these messages are printed in today's issue of THE NEW YORK TIMES, beginning on column 8 of Page 1 of the second news section.]

Because so many messages were received and because the members of the expedition are busily engaged in special activities.

BYRD FLIGHT COVERS 35,000 SQUARE MILES

he thinks is a deep arm of the sea that penetrates far to the southward and cuts off Edward VII Land and the Alexandra Mountains from the new mountain range.

"This gives his discovery added importance because it shows that the new mountain range is an entirely detached and independent topographic feature having no direct or immediate connection with the topographical features on the eastern border of the Ross Dependency."

Special Category of Polar Claims.

Explaining the importance of Commander Byrd's exploring the coast, he said:

"In the polar regions, territorial claims bear a quite different stamp as contrasted with those set up in regions of potential permanent settlement.

"In so far as any claims to polar territories are valid or recognized, they must rest not upon the principle of permanent occupation, but upon what has been called 'notification of fact,' that is, in general, by a specific communication to other powers.

"If we take the view of 'reasonable possession,' as stated by Richard Olney, Secretary of State in 1896, we shall find it well illustrated by British claims and operations in the Antarctic.

British Interests in the Antarctic.

"The research work carried on by the British in Antarctic waters under government auspices is continuous and bears directly on the whaling industry, which is the only economic interest that has been developed up to the present time.

"In order to avoid the consideration of the new discoveries as mere continuation by land from the Ross Dependency, it seemed desirable to make an independent tie-up with the coast line in case further consideration of the discoveries makes it wise for the United States Government to set up a specific claim."

The Ross Dependency was set up on July 30, 1923, by an order of the King in Council, under the jurisdiction of the Governor General of New Zealand. According to the order, it comprises "all the islands and territories between the 160th degree of East Longitude and the 150th degree of West Longitude, which are situated south of the 60th degree of South Latitude." It includes a far larger territory than that just mapped by Commander Byrd.

The matter of adjustment of the respective Antarctic claims of Great Britain and the United States has been long pending and has not been pushed, partly because of their present relative unimportance.

GERMAN SCIENTIST HAILS BYRD'S RESULTS

Prof. Baschin of Berlin Says Aerial Exploration Will Soon Complete Antarctic Map.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Dec. 7.—Professor Otto Baschin, Custodian of the Geographical Institute of the University of Berlin and himself an explorer of the Arctic regions, says in an article published here today that "Commander Byrd's deed must be valued as an important step in the history of South Pole exploration, because it opens a well-founded prospect for intensified effort to unveil the last unknown masses of land which still can be found on the globe."

"The daring American flier, Commander Byrd, by reaching the South Pole with an airplane, proved that the most modern and the speediest of all transportation means can not only be employed successfully in the border territory of the Antarctic but can also be thrust into the heart of that mysterious hemisphere completely buried under ice," Professor Baschin stated.

Professor Baschin then gives a description of the efforts to conquer the South Pole by various expeditions beginning with that of Captain James Cook's attempt in 1733 and followed by those of Sir James Clark Ross, C. E. Borchgrevink, Sir Ernest Shackleton, Captain Robert F. Scott and Captain Roald Amundsen, and continues:

"With the tragedy of Scott's dreadful death ends the epoch of Antarctic exploration which depended on human and animal power.

"Since December, 1927, we have been in a new period which is marked by the victory of the gasoline motor."

He describes the Antarctic flight of Captain Sir Hubert Wilkins, who, in five hours and twenty-five minutes of flying, "added more toward the completion of South Pole maps than all the English, German, Belgian, Norwegian and French expeditions together."

After reciting Commander Byrd's careful preparation and various accidents, Professor Baschin concludes:

"Thus the exploration of our globe nears with giant strides its end, and soon the blank space around the South Pole will be filled in on our charts with the results of photographic pictures which fliers were able to gather easily, as well as cartographic material from heights which permit wide survey."

PROPOSES "ADMIRAL BYRD."

Long Beach (Cal.) Sun Suggests Honor for Explorer.

Commander Byrd's latest achievement of flying over the South Pole calls for national recognition, says The Long Beach Sun, Long Beach, Cal., in an editorial dated Dec. 2 and headed, "Why Not Admiral Byrd?" Besides his services in the name of science for the glorification of his country, says the editorial, "he has performed a distinct service to the youth of this country in creating a hero worthy of emulation and as a stimulus to ambition.

"Is it not fitting on this occasion," the article concludes, "for us to say that the navy and the nation would be honored in having such a distinguished man as an Admiral—such a sailor, who has fought the barriers of nature, has braved unknown perils over unchartered seas and has piloted his own flagship to victory!

"Let our next Congress honor itself by dedicating its first act to promoting Commander Byrd, and may the Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy be the first to transmit by radio the thanks of Congress to Admiral Richard E. Byrd, U. S. N.!"

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

PRINCE AND SISTERS PAY VISIT TO POPE

Italian Heir and Princesses Kiss Pontiff's Ring—Receive Apostolic Blessing.

RICH GIFTS ARE EXCHANGED

Royal Party Worships at the Tomb of the Apostles—Gasparri and Nuncio Return Call.

By ARNALDO CORTESI.
Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

VATICAN CITY, Dec. 7.—With ceremonial very similar to that used for the visit of the Italian sovereigns on Thursday, the Pope today received the Italian Crown Prince and the royal Princesses Giovanna and Maria, accompanied by Senator de Vecchi, the Italian Ambassador accredited to the Holy See. The Pontiff received them with marked benignity and kindness, which visibly moved them.

Prince Humbert, who was accompanied by his military household, wore the uniform of a Colonel of the Italian infantry. The Princesses, who were accompanied by the Queen's ladies-in-waiting, were dressed all in white, with lace mantillas on their heads. The Pope, as is usual on such occasions, was dressed all in white.

The Prince and the Princesses were received alone in the little throne room, while their suites waited outside. They fell on their knees as the Pope came toward them and kissed his ring. Then seats were disposed in front of the throne on which the Pope sat. At the end of the audience they again knelt before the Pope, who imparted an apostolic benediction.

After the royal audience the retinues of the Prince and of the Princesses were admitted and introduced to the Pope, who blessed them after giving them his hand to kiss. The audience lasted twenty-five minutes.

Gifts were exchanged and the Prince presented to the Pope a rich agate cup mounted in gold. The Princesses gave him two crystal vases mounted in gold and agate. The Pope gave the Prince a richly ornamented leather case containing three medals in gold, silver and bronze, specially coined for the occasion, and a miniature with his portrait and autograph. He presented to Princess Giovanna a rosary in gold and a miniature representing the sacerdotal jubilee with his autograph. To Princess Marie he gave a rosary in coral and gold and a miniature representing the Virgin with the Child and angels, along with his autograph.

After the papal audience the Prince and Princesses called on Cardinal Gasparri, Papal Secretary of State. Then they descended and were received by Cardinal Merry del Val, archpriest of the Basilica.

After worshiping at the Tomb of the Apostles the royal party returned to the Quirinal, where shortly afterward they received Cardinal Gasparri and Mgr. Borgongini Duca, Papal Nuncia accredited to Italy, who called to return the visit in the name of the Pope.

TO APPEAL FOR FUNDS FOR HERRICK MEMORIAL

Paris Council Will Open Public Subscription to Build a Monument to American.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Dec. 7.—That people of France, whom he loved, may have opportunity of contributing to a fund for erecting a fitting monument to the memory of the late American Ambassador Herrick, the Municipal Council the week after next will open a public subscription appeal.

A special commission charged with drawing the plans for the memorial will meet Monday, and the succeeding week thousands of posters will appear in Paris and throughout the country calling upon the French people to show their appreciation for the great diplomat by participating in the cost of a monument to him.

M. Dandigne, president of the Municipal Council, in announcing this decision, said:

"Myron T. Herrick died in the midst of us in Paris, which he loved to his dying day. And Paris, which returned this tenderness, wept over the loss of a true friend. It is but just that the features of Myron T. Herrick should be engraved in indelible stone, so that future generations may be aware that heroism sometimes is allied to diplomacy."

COUPLE KILLED, SON SHOT.

Relative Finds Bodies and Wounded Man Near Italy, Texas.

ITALY, Texas, Dec. 7 (AP.)—Ace Riley and his wife were found shot to death and a son wounded, probably fatally, in their farm home near the Lone Cedar community, four miles from here, today.

The bodies and the wounded man were found by a relative, who told officers he walked thirteen miles to the home of other relatives to inform them of the shooting. He was ordered held for further questioning while Ellis County officers began an investigation.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

MORE AUTOMATS PICKETED.

Union Would Include Whole Horn & Hardart System.

William Lehman, vice president of the International Alliance of Hotel and Restaurant Employes, announced yesterday that picketing of the chain Automat restaurants controlled by the Horn & Hardart Company would be extended until all of the company's twenty-three cafeterias here are included in the campaign to unionize the restaurant system.

"We are now picketing three Automat restaurants," said Mr. Lehman. "Our efforts to obtain a conference with the management have been repulsed. As rapidly as possible we will assign pickets to the other branches in an effort to unionize the employes."

Irving Epstein, organizer of the Joint Council of Food Craft Unions, in charge of the unionization campaign, said that bus boys in the Automat restaurants earn from 20 to 22 cents an hour, countermen between 35 and 38 cents an hour and cooks 40 to 45 cents an hour. He declared that all the wage rates were far below the union scale.

Thomas Huber, in charge of the personnel of the Horn & Hardart Company, 600 West Fiftieth Street, was said to be out of town yesterday. At the office it was said no statement could be made in Mr. Huber's absence. He is expected to return tomorrow.

SAYS FORD PLANS BABY CAR IN EUROPE

French Business Daily Reports He Will Construct Model Wholly at Cologne.

QUOTA IDEA AGAIN DEBATED

International Automobile Makers to Consider Restricting Imports of American Machines.

By CARLISLE MacDONALD
Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Dec. 7.—Henry Ford is about to place the "baby Ford" upon the European market, according to La Journée Industrielle, leading French business daily, which says that it has confirmed the news. A factory is now in course of construction on the banks of the Rhine, near Cologne, where a baby car smaller and much cheaper than the present model will be wholly constructed, according to the paper.

If the newspaper's information is correct the Cologne works will be the only Ford plant in Europe where the Ford product will be made in its entirety, all the other factories being in the nature of assembling plants for parts brought from the United States. For the present it is the intention of the Ford company to confine the baby car to European markets. The operation of the Cologne baby car works, according to the paper, will begin on a limited scale with a maximum of 1,000 employes.

It is understood that the success of the new Ford model in the French market, while not sensational, has been sufficient to encourage further expansion. Under the present schedule the Paris Ford plant is turning out sixty cars a day.

The latest figures for the year 1929, mentioned in these dispatches a few days ago, estimated the total sales of American cars in France at between 14,000 and 15,000, of which 10,000 were Fords assembled here. The undoubted popularity of American-made automobiles throughout Europe, even in those highly protected markets like France, where the duty is 45 per cent, is causing much concern among Continental motor car manufacturers. The idea of some restrictive understanding which would limit the importation of foreign cars in each country to a definitely fixed number is again being actively discussed.

While business circles see little chance of such a scheme being adopted, European automobile manufacturers are expected to give this question and the whole matter of American competition further consideration when they meet in Brussels for the annual session of the permanent bureau of the International Automobile Makers next Monday and Tuesday. At two previous meetings called in Paris to talk over the same subject no progress was made.

Warns Against Fake Christmas Fund

The Western Union Telegraph Company has issued a warning against "unscrupulous messengers and fakirs representing themselves as messengers, who, at about this time each year endeavor to enrich their pockets by fleecing the business public out of contributions to a mythical Messengers' Christmas Fund." The Western Union gives to its deserving employes a bonus and prohibits the solicitation of Christmas gratuities by its messengers.

EDISON DONS OLD PANAMA.

Plans Survey of Florida Estate Before Resuming Experiments.

FORT MYERS, Fla., Dec. 7 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison discarded his black derby for a floppy, well-worn panama hat today and planned an extensive survey of his tropical estate, Seminole Lodge, preparatory to resuming rubber experiments.

Mr. Edison first came to Florida in 1883 and three years later brought Mrs. Edison here on their wedding trip. Although the Edisons have been annual visitors since that time their arrival last night was the first time they have come South as early as December.

"Well, I haven't been feeling so well," the 82-year-old inventor told friends, and his wife explained that he was tired from the trip and "needed a change."

A corps of laboratory assistants preceded Mr. Edison here and were ready to begin their work of testing plants for possible rubber content. Mr. Edison expects to stay until July.

SEEK FRENCH NAVY BIGGER THAN ITALY'S

Calculations Before the Senate Group, Based on Five Needs, Put Ratio at 3 to 1.

POLITICAL ISSUES AVOIDED

Scale Gives America Less Than Half British Total—Method Is Scored as Too Logical.

By EDWIN L. JAMES.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 7.—No little interest is displayed by the British capital in the estimate of the French naval needs placed before the Navy Committee of the Senate in Paris. Using a "coefficient of defense," the French calculate their requirements in warships in relation to the four other powers which will attend the five-power conference in London in January.

Three weeks ago M. Briand told this correspondent in a long conversation in Paris that the French approach to the naval conference would be to seek a criterion for the relative measurement of naval needs and then to try to have this criterion applied. The new French calculation undoubtedly represents what the Foreign Minister then had in mind.

The French estimate is based entirely on material and practical grounds, which is to say it does not embrace political considerations.

Five Items Set Criterion.

The items used to make up the criterion are five:

First, area of territory; second, length of coasts; third, length of communications; fourth, external trade, and fifth, sea-borne traffic.

The French estimate that under the first item the needs of the five powers are in the following ratios: The British Empire, 15.8; the United States, 4; Japan, .3; Italy, 1, and France, 4.7.

Under the second item the needs are given as: The British Empire 9.5; the United States, 4.6; Japan, 3; Italy, 1, and France, 2.3.

Item three gives: The British Empire, 11.2; the United States, 3.2; Japan, 1; Italy, 1, and France, 6.8.

Item four gives: The British Empire, 10.6; the United States, 5.3; Japan, 1.3; Italy, 1, and France, 2.7.

Item five gives: The British Empire, 17.8; the United States, 7.6; Japan, 2.3; Italy, 1, and France, 3.6.

A combination of these ratios gives the following composite table:

The British Empire, 10; the United States, 4.2; France, 3; Japan, 1.6, and Italy, 1.

In other words, the French figure they need three times as much war fleet tonnage as Italy and incidentally that the United States needs less than half as much as the British Empire for purposes of defence.

French Need Put Above Italy's.

Of course, the French are not worrying about the American fleet and what they really seek to show is that Italy does not need as big a fleet as France.

Such a calculation might appeal to British naval technicians, for what they seek is a two-power position in the Mediterrenean, which is to say a strength in every class equal to the combined strength of Italy and France.

If the French criterion was applied, it would mean a measure of ten for Britain against one plus three, or four for Italy and France. Also, the British contend they have estimated their needs along lines analogous to those the French take.

However, British statesmen cannot espouse the French system of calculation because it puts the United States' needs at less than half the British war tonnage. That would risk offending the American position, and that is the last thing British statesmen wish to do. It is obvious that if the criterion were applied in the way the French suggest, to determine the self-defense needs of the various nations, it would seriously affect America's showing of her need for a navy equal to Britain's.

Of course, the trouble with the French formula is that it is too logical and errs in leaving out political factors. Nor are the French very logical in calling the London conference primarily a political conference, and at the same time seeking to measure fleets without regard to political considerations.

Plan Held Purely Technical.

If they can use their formula to convince Italy that she does not need as large a fleet as France, well and good, but they could scarcely expect the United States to measure its fleet needs on such a basis. The American position, of course, contains elements which the French have not taken into consideration. And, after all, it might be said that if Britain is willing to agree to American parity, it little behooves the too logical French to come along with another formula and expect it to be adopted generally.

As The London Times says in an editorial today:

"The French formula is a purely mathematical and technical calculation and takes no account of political considerations. It does, however, serve a useful purpose by emphasizing geographical and economic factors which are fundamentals of the problem."

One hopeful feature of the French calculation is the estimate of French needs at three-tenths the tonnage of the British fleet, which comes somewhere near the ratios laid down for capital ships by the Washington naval conference. But one must not lose sight of the fact that the French will surely stick to their theory that they are talking about total tonnage, for they would never let their calculation be read to mean they need only one-third as many submarines as Britain says she needs. Doubtless, they calculate that, the British fleet having 1,200,000 tons, the French need 360,000 tons, allocated as they see fit. Should Britain and America agree to the abolition of capital ships, interesting results might follow from the application of the French formula to all the naval powers.

Calculation Shows Difficulty.

However, when all is said and done, it is only truthful to point out that the French calculation illustrates one of the great difficulties which the American desire for an equal fleet with that of Britain has always met, and probably will always meet, in international conference. The United States has never succeeded in convincing the other powers that for purely defensive purposes the self-contained United States needs as great a fleet as the far-flung British Empire. And since the United States' major premise is formed on the Kellogg pact, which would permit the use of its warships only for defense, American diplomats will again in January face the peril of being put in a position to prove what, probably, they will not prove to the satisfaction of the theorists of the other nations. Of course, if America simply said she wanted as big a fleet as that of Britain and that she was going to build it, the American position would be firm enough. But on the self-defense plea, the United States will always risk running up against such arguments as that contained in the French calculation.

Inasmuch as the introduction of such calculation would promote discord, it might seem that in preparing diplomatically for a harmonious conference the United States might point out to the French the unwisdom of their methods. The United States might suggest that it really does not mean to cause any more discomfort for the French over submarines than they cause for the United States with their mathematical formula. What could be fairer?

FRANCE SETS ARMS COSTS.

Budget Report Gives $103,320,000 for Navy, $250,000,000 for Army.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Dec. 7.—France will spend next year 4,500,000,000 francs (about $180,000,000) on her home army and 1,750,000,000 francs (about $70,000,000) for the defense of her overseas possessions, according to figures given in the budget report of Deputy Bouilloux Lafont. The army of 277,000 men, which will be enrolled under the colors either as service men or conscripts, will cost less than the amount Germany pays for the upkeep of the 100,000 men of the Reichswehr and the 35,000 Schupos (Prussian police).

The appropriations for the navy will amount to 2,583,000,000 francs (about $103,320,000), or slightly more than one-quarter of the navy cost to the United States.

NEW CLOTHES FOR THE SOUTH

The most interesting of the new fashions in sport and evening clothes—beach things more amusing than ever—all are here, done in the Jay-Thorpe genre. Ready now for those going South early.

The Jay-Thorpe Shops at Palm Beach and Miami will open soon.

Now a very

New Idea

in southern shoes

Toulon, Antibes, Como—all the Continental resorts that key the Palm Beach mode—have indicated the smartness of white. But not white worn by itself! White with a note of accessory color—a bright but subtle "semi-tone"

So the new Jay-Thorpe Shoe Salon introduces an absolutely new idea—the fine bench-made shoe of white suede with appliqué in color dyed to match an accessory!

It is a new idea—a new process—and the results are delightful. In sport shoes, the buckskin appliqué takes color vividly. In more formal pumps of white or pale beige suede, the narrow suede appliqué glows like subtly colored velvet.

A new fashion and one that carries south the idea of—"Shoes as ultra-smart—as individual—as Jay-Thorpe clothes".

Southern shoes from 15.50 to 26.50

HECKSCHER CREATES CHILD HEALTH UNIT

New Institute to Be Established at Foundation to Provide Tests for Disease Prevention.

Creation by August Heckscher of the Heckscher Institute for Child Health, which will be housed in the Heckscher Foundation at Fifth Avenue and 104th Street, was announced yesterday. The great number of children showing physical and mental defects while at the Foundation prompted Mr. Heckscher to establish the institute as a central clearing house for the early recognition and prevention of disease and defectiveness, the announcement stated.

Directed by Dr. I. Newton Kugelmass, director of the children's research department of the Fifth Avenue Hospital, who will be assisted by some of the city's leading physicians, the institute will provide for the children attending the Foundation periodical medical examinations. The children will be helped to attain normal growth, good physical form, adequate mentality and social adaptability. Special diagnostic clinics conducted by physicians will be held at the institute and the necessary treatments will be given by cooperating hospitals.

BOY COASTER IS KILLED.

Sled Crashes Into an Automobile Parked in Croton Street.

Special to The New York Times.

CROTON, N. Y., Dec. 7.—The first coasting death in Westchester County this Winter occurred here this morning when Stephen King, 12 years old, son of John King of Brooks Street, crashed into a parked automobile on Riverside Avenue as he was coasting down Farrington Road. The boy's head was crushed as his sled passed under the car.

Dr. William F. Miller worked over the boy for three-quarters of an hour without success. An escort of State police accompanied the boy to Ossining Hospital, where he died.

2 ARMY FLIERS DIE IN ARIZONA CRASH

Burning of One Laid to Match Thrown on Fuel-Soaked Ground by Mexican.

TRIED TO LAND IN CANYON

But Machine, Its Motor Stalled, Hit Power Wire and Plunged to Earth.

MIAMI, Ariz., Dec. 7 (AP).—Two army aviators, Lieutenant R. H. Gilley, aged 25, of Houston, Texas, and Lieutenant J. Q. Adams, 24, of Inglewood, Cal., stationed at March Field, Riverside, Cal., were killed today when their open cockpit biplane crashed and burned near the Inspiration mine, four miles north of here.

The wrecked ship was burned, witnesses said, when an unidentified Mexican who ran to the scene immediately after the crash, lighted a sigarette and threw the burning match on the gasoline-saturated ground. The airplane was enveloped in flames and it was believed Lieutenant Gilley was burned to death. Adams was thought to have died in the wreck.

The pilots, who came here several days ago to take part in dedication of an airport, took off on the return trip to March Field and had circled the mine when their motor apparently stalled. They attempted to land in a canyon but the plane struck a power line and crashed to the ground.

BUILDING FOR THE FUTURE ON FOUNDATIONS OF THE PAST

PROGRESS is the motivating power which must sooner or later engulf even tradition. For a full decade, the McCreery Fifth Avenue Arcade has stood, not only as an entrance, but as a symbol of all that is fine in merchandising. Yet to serve the inevitable march of progress, this familiar landmark has met the fate of the wrecker and has been replaced by architectural beauty nowhere exceeded. . . . . .

Thursday It Is Completed!

We are proud—for it is work well done. It is possibly the finest thing of its kind in New York—for it expresses the ultimate in beauty . . . in modernism . . . in good taste . . . in convenience . . . in youthful ideas.

Yet . . .

This NEW Fifth Avenue Arcade is more than a gesture of architectural significance . . . it is a reward for 72 years of honest effort and efficient service, to thousands upon thousands of New Yorkers—who, generation after generation, have honored us with their confidence and patronage. ~ ~ Moreover this NEW Fifth Avenue Arcade is a fitting response to all those who lack faith in the financial structure and stability of this great city —for it is an emblazoned challenge to the future, a vision of merchandising advance, in tune with the continued and ever constant progress of New York. . . . . .

What Does It Represent?

Simply the highest ideals of a sincere, conscientious group of men and women—who have labored to make this a modern, fashionable store of and for the people . . . who have not prated of an impossible ability to undersell our neighbors continually . . . who have not vaingloriously boasted of our power to bring you new things first . . . who have not tested your credulity with absurd use of comparative prices . . . who, in point of fact, have been actively and entirely occupied through the years, with but two thoughts . . . and those of SERVICE and VALUE. How we can more intelligently, efficiently and sympathetically serve your wants . . . how we can better bring to you the quality wares of the world at consistently right prices. How we can register to you, for almost anything you might desire, McCREERY'S . . . with the conviction implanted in your mind that at McCreery's you shall find it—new, fashion-correct, quality-certain and fairly priced. . . . . .

Won't you stop in Thursday to see just what we have accomplished for your convenience?

Four New and Charming Shops Greet You!

In this New Arcade are four individual and complete "little shops" developed in a delightfully modern form . . . four little expressions of taste and individuality personified by achievement. Four little discoveries that will put New York in a holiday mood the year round. Four charming little surprises for you who are starting your gift quest—

STARTS NEW MOVE TO FREE FILIPINOS

Representative Strong, Former Opponent, Tells House the Islands Are Liability.

CHANCE OF SUCCESS SEEN

Free Trade in Sugar and Oils Is Said to Irk the Protective Tariff Advocates.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—The beginning of a new movement for giving independence to the Philippine Islands came unexpectedly in the House of Representatives late this afternoon.

At any prior time this development might have had little significance, but it is evident that a strong opinion exists in both Senate and House that any concerted effort on the part of those favoring independence would obtain much headway, on account of a situation in Congress that has tended to bring about a more favorable attitude toward the cause of independence.

It was while the House was considering the annual supply bill for the Interior Department that Representative Strong of Kansas, a Republican, who heretofore has been opposed to Philippine independence, took the floor to announce, after referring to the Philippines, that he now was in favor of "bidding them good-bye and godspeed."

He contended that the islands were a liability to the United States, and said that in his present opinion he was in accord with the movement for independence.

Representative Strong was continuing when Representative Garner of Texas, the Democratic floor leader, jumped to his feet to ask the former opponent of Philippine independence if he would be willing to help draft and put through Congress the proper measure to free the islands of American rule.

"Yes," answered Representative Strong promptly.

Sees Independence Within a Year.

"Then the Philippines should be free within a year," declared the Democratic floor leader.

That impetus is likely to be given to a renewal of the movement for Philippine independence, should it be undertaken under present circumstances, has been in the back of the heads of those who have an interest in the subject.

That independence, with consequent withdrawal of the duty-free American market, would soon result in economic failure in the island and the inability of the independent government to raise enough revenue to pay expenses is firmly believed by a considerable number of those who have studied the situation.

But in their ranks there now appears to be a fair-sized segment of opinion that if the Filipino politicos want it they should have it, if for no other reason that independence will end the almost continuous political agitation and turmoil which have been in progress for many years.

On account of practical considerations, the question of Philippine independence has taken on a new and important aspect recently. This aspect was the outcome of the tariff situation, and especially the failure of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate to give way to the demand from sections of this country which raise beet sugar, and other sections where Philippine cocoanut oil comes into competition with our vegetable oils.

As the tariff bill passed the House, and as it now stands in the Senate, there is no provision for depriving the Philippines of free customs entry of all their products into the United States, and no prospect that the majority opposition to such a provision will change.

Opportunity for Tariff Advocates.

At the same time Senators and Representatives from beet sugar States and those producing vegetable oils in large quantities have acquired a temper which could easily be translated into determination to press for Philippine independence, if a favorable opportunity were presented.

That opportunity seems to have been offered by what happened in the House this evening.

When, during the last Congress, Representative Timberlake of Colorado offered a measure limiting the entrance of duty-free Philippine sugar to 300,000 tons a year, there were evidences of a quick change of attitude on the independence movement among many Filipinos of the better classes, especially those who owned property. Up to that time the independence movement had been endorsed by practically all classes of the native people.

But when the Timberlake measure was proposed, many of these came out boldly not only against the proposal to levy duties on Philippine sugar, but also against independence, which would have made all Philippine products dutiable.

Recently the independence movement has been revived and the insular Legislature, composed entirely of natives, is sending another of its independence missions to Washington to work for the "complete and immediate" freedom of the islands from American rule.

MORROW BACKERS ORGANIZE FOR FIGHT

Plan Linking of Local Clubs Into State-Wide Association for Senatorial Campaign.

ESSEX CLASH THREATENED

Country Chairman Salmon Supports Frelinghuysen and Patronage Contest Is In Prospect.

Formation of a State-wide organization of Republicans to support the candidacy of Dwight W. Morrow, Ambassador to Mexico, for the Republican nomination for United States Senator in New Jersey is expected to begin this week.

Information concerning this followed a visit of David Baird Jr., Senator-designate, to Newark, where he conferred with Mayor Jerome T. Congleton on plans for the expected primary fight against former Senator Joseph S. Frelinghuysen. With Mayor Congleton and County Counsel Arthur T. Singleton supporting Mr. Morrow and County Chairman Jesse R. Salmon supporting Mr. Frelinghuysen, a lively primary fight is expected in Essex County next year.

The efforts of Mr. Morrow's supporters in forming an organization for him will be centred in Northern New Jersey, as the support of Senator Baird and Enoch Johnson, Atlantic County leader, is believed to assure him a large majority in South Jersey.

There has been considerable activity in starting county organizations for Mr. Morrow and these county organizations, it was said, undoubtedly will be merged eventually into a State-wide organization. In Bergen county, where Mr. Morrow has his home, many of the Republicans who had been supporting Mr. Frelinghuysen have shifted to Mr. Morrow.

There are indications that patronage, both State and Federal, will be used to further the candidacy of Mr. Morrow, particularly in Essex County. Governor Larson is to appoint a judge of the Court of Common Pleas and a commissioner of the election board in Essex County and is not expected to take the recommendations of Mr. Salmon.

Selection of a chairman of a State-wide Morrow committee probably will await the return of the Ambassador to Washington, where he will confer with Senators Kean and Baird, Governor Larson, National Committeeman Daniel E. Pomeroy and others supporting his candidacy.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

POLICE HEAD ARRESTED.

Commissioner Wood of Union, N. J, Accused of Roadhouse Conspiracy.

Special to The New York Times.

ELIZABETH, Dec. 7.—Arrested as he was leaving his home, 5 Midland Boulevard, Union, this morning, Police Commissioner Benjamin E. Wood of Union Township was arraigned before Justice of the Peace James P. Kelly here and held for the grand jury under $1,000 bail on a charge of conspiring to maintain a roadhouse in Union as a disorderly house.

Wood pleaded not guilty to the complaint made as a result of an investigation by the prosecutor's office. The complaint alleges that Wood was a co-conspirator in allowing the sale of liquor, the operation of gambling machines and the maintenance of the roadhouse as a disorderly place.

Michael Messa is under indictment in connection with alleged irregularities said to have occurred at the roadhouse and John Debellas is serving a year in State's prison on similar charges.

FOX OWES TRUSTEES $27,000,000 ON NOTES

Halsey, Stuart & Co. Is Creditor for $12,000,000 for Financing Operation Last April.

$15,000,000 TO THE A. T. & T.

Two Named by Fox Represent Third of Obligations—Rest Said to Be Chiefly Bank Loans.

The two trustees appointed by William Fox to act with him in the control of his motion picture and theatre interests represent $27,000,000 of the short term obligations of the companies, it was learned yesterday. American Telephone and Telegraph Company holds a note of the Fox Film Corporation for $15,000,000 and Halsey, Stuart & Co. underwrote last May $12,000,000 in 6 per cent notes of the same corporation, which are due on April 1, 1930.

John E. Otterson, one of the trustees, is president of the Electrical Research Products, Inc., which is a wholly owned subsidiary of Western Electric Company, which in turn is 98 per cent owned by American Telephone and Telegraph. The other trustee, Harry L. Halsey, is a member of Halsey Stuart & Co.

The larger part of the remainder of the $91,000,000, which is understood to be the total of the short-term commitments of the companies, are reported to be chiefly bank loans made upon collateral, chiefly the shares of Loew's, Inc., which were acquired by the Fox Theatres Corporation, last February, and shares of the Gaumont Theatres Corporation, which were acquired by Fox Film Corporation last July.

Relations Very Friendly.

It was also understood that obligations to the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, or its subsidiaries, may be larger, developing from contract payments due, or other loans which may have been advanced. The Fox Film Corporation has been the pioneer of the sound-on-film method of producing talking pictures, for which it took out the first license from Western Electric which that company ever issued. Mr. Fox himself spent considerable money in developing the invention, and the relations between Western Electric, and later with Electric Research Products, Inc., which was formed to handle the talking motion-picture products of Western Electric, have been most friendly. It was said that Mr. Otterson's personal friendship for Mr. Fox was as big a factor in his acceptance of the invitation to act as trustee, as was the importance with which the Fox companies are regarded by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company in expanding the business of Electrical Research Products, Inc.

It was estimated yesterday that expenditures of Fox Film Corporation and Fox Theatres Corporation with Electrical Research Products for talking-picture equipment, both in theatres and studios, exceeded $25,000,000 during the past two years. In addition to this Electrical Research Products collects a royalty on each foot of film recorded by its equipment and maintains a servicing weekly charge on equipment in theatres. Royalty and servicing charges were estimated to have amounted to an additional $5,000,000 during the same period. The note which American Telephone and Telegraph holds of the Fox Film Corporation is believed to represent largely deferment of payments rather than an advance of cash.

Details on Note Refused.

Details regarding the maturity of the $15,000,000 note could not be learned yesterday. Mr. Otterson refused to see interviewers and other persons connected with the American Telephone and Telegraph Company and its subsidiaries said that no one but Mr. Otterson could discuss matters relating to the trusteeship beyond the statement that the company was very friendly to the Fox companies. The existence of the note was learned only through the fact that it was subordinated to the issue of $12,000,000 6 per cent notes which were marketed by Halsey, Stuart & Co. It is understood that it was made out for one year and is therefore due some time before April 1, as it was in existence at the time the note offering was prepared by Halsey, Stuart & Co. However, it was the general feeling yesterday among interests closely associated with both American Telephone and Telegraph and the Fox companies that the note would be extended.

Halsey, Stuart & Co. are understood to have no financial interest in any of the Fox companies, beyond the interest in the $12,000,000 in notes which they sold. This could not be confirmed yesterday, however, as Mr. Halsey was not at his office and it was said that neither the firm nor he would have any statement to make about the affairs of the Fox companies. Mr. Fox, also, denied himself to interviewers, and members of his organizaton asserted that the anouncement he had made on Friday naming the trustees was the last statement he would personally make in connection with the affairs of the company, and that all future announcements would come from the board of trustees.

Wall Street opinion regarded the entry of the American Telephone and Telegraph representative and Halsey, Stuart & Co. into the management of the Fox interests as a favorable development. The "A" stock of the Fox Film Corporation closed on the New York Stock Exchange at 55¾, an increase of 2½ points in the two-hour trading period, and on the New York Curb Exchange shares of Fox Theatres Corporation made a ½-point gain, closing at 10¾.

FOX'S INVASION STIRS BRITISH FILM WORLD

Press Asserts Native Industry Will Have to Fight Hard for Its Life as Result.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 7.—The report of the acquisition of the Gaumont British Corporation, the largest film circuit in Britain, controlling more than 300 leading screen theatres, by William Fox and his associates was received in film circles here today with some apprehension.

According to one evening newspaper, "America will now have a stranglehold on the British industry. A quota act requiring that 7½ per cent of the films shown shall be British is the only safeguard against the exclusion of British films altogether."

"Nor will American influence end with the control of films to be shown," the paper goes on. "John E. Oterson, president of the Electrical Research Products, Inc., and named by Mr. Fox on the board of trustees which will manage his interests, is associated with the Western Electric Company, whose talkie apparatus is being installed in British theatres to the exclusion of other apparatus.

"The British International Film Corportion will become a major production company owned by the British. Although they control a circuit of only 120 cinemas, against Mr. Fox's 300, they will be the one effective rival to the American challenge.

"The deal is a deadly blow at our struggling industry. With the enemy within its gates it will have to fight hard for its life."

It is pointed out, however, that the articles of the Gaumont-British company have been amended to provide that every director should be a British subject and that foreigners should not have voting power.

The Gaumont-controlled theatres in London's West End include the Tivoli, the Capitol, the Astoria, the Marble Arch, the Pavilion and the New Gallery, with the Empire already Fox-controlled.

Another American invasion is heralded by the arrival of Dr. Kalmus, president of Technicolor, who proposes to spend $500,000 building a plant here. According to Dr. Kalmus, it will be an independent concern, renting color film cameras to all firms who desire them.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

A New Rug
A New Weave
A New Low Price!

Not exactly a Wilton. Not exactly an Axminster. But an entirely new rug that combines the best features of both! It is tightly woven like a Wilton with a smooth back that lies flat and hugs the floor. Its nap does not "shed" or ruff up. Its colors are clear Wilton colors. The patterns—all of them Oriental—A & S had copied from a high priced Wilton line. But the softness of the pile is like an Axminster—a velvety sort of quality, very rich. And the price—that's the climax! About what you'd pay for a medium-priced Axminster! And with it you get the wear, the looks, and the firmness of a Wilton!

A special purchase! Based on the cost of manufacture, the usual price would be $69.50 and $72.50 respectively.

CITES NEW DECISION IN I. R. T. FARE FIGHT

Ransom Asserts Voiding of Los Angeles Contract Should Guide Court Here.

UNTERMYER ASSAILS VIEW

Sees Federal Supreme Court Ruling as Upholding Validity of Five-Cent Rate Clause.

Supreme Court Justice Phoenix Ingraham, who has under consideration the question of the binding force of the five-cent clause in the contracts between the city and the Interborough Rapid Transit Company, received yesterday from William L. Ransom, counsel for the company, an eight-page letter presenting his contention that the recent United States Supreme Court decision in the case of the Los Angeles trolley lines should control the decision in the Interborough case.

The high court on Monday held that the city of Los Angeles had no authority to enter into five-cent fare contracts with the traction lines, which, therefore, were not bound by such agreements, but were entitled to have their application for higher fares passed upon by the California Railroad Commission.

In the Transit Commission's suit to prevent the Interborough from increasing the five-cent fare on its subway and elevated lines, the commission contended that under the rapid transit act it had the power to make binding fare contracts for the city and it had no jurisdiction to hear the company's application to change the rate. The sole issue tried before Justice Ingraham was the binding force of the contracts. He has yet to hand down his decision.

His analysis of the Los Angeles decision, Mr. Ransom informed Justice Ingraham, was prompted by an earlier letter sent to the Justice by Samuel Untermyer, special counsel for the Transit Commission. This letter analyzed the case as upholding the Transit Commission's contention. Before receiving a copy of the Untermyer letter, Mr. Ransom wrote, he had intended to rest content with having sent to Justice Ingraham on Tuesday a copy of the majority and dissenting opinions in the Los Angeles case. A spokesman for Mr. Untermyer said that the company had not notified him of its action in submitting the Los Angeles opinion, although the action itself was in the nature of submitting briefs after the time limit had expired.

Mr. Ransom's letter declared that the majority opinion in the Los Angeles case, written by Justice Pierce Butler, found no legislative authority under which the city of Los Angeles could make a binding fare contract. The California statutes, the letter said, were fully as broad as those under which the Transit Commission contends it could make a binding fare contract for the city in the case of subway fares. In the case of elevated fares, Mr. Ransom contended, the California statutes were even broader than those of New York. Mr. Ransom emphasized language in Justice Butler's opinion indicating the need of express words of grant in delegating the State's rate-making power. These, he said, were not to be found in the Rapid Transit act in this State.

Mr. Untermyer's letter was in support of the view that the Los Angeles case had no application in the pending Interborough litigation in the State courts. Justice Butler, he declared, expressly recognized that a State could authorize a city to make a contract for public service rates and thus suspend, for a period not grossly excessive, the State's own power to regulate rates.

It was learned yesterday that while he was in Los Angeles last Winter that city sought Mr. Untermyer's aid in connection with the fare litigation, but because of poor health he was unable to act.

SEE BETTER FUTURE FOR AMERICAN INDIANS

Speakers at National Meeting Here Tell of Interest Aroused Among Government Officials.

In spite of an insufficient supply of food and clothing for many Indian reservations, the "direct and sympathetic interest taken in Indian affairs by the present administration" indicates an "optimistic future" for the American Indian, according to several speakers yesterday at the fiftieth anniversary meeting of the National Indian Association at the Hotel McAlpin.

One hundred and fifty delegates and guests from New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania and the District of Columbia, and a few from Western States, heard M. K. Sniffen, secretary of the Indian Rights Association, condemn the feeding of children in Indian schools on the "disgraceful sum of 11 cents a day."

"The interest of President Hoover, Secretary of the Interior Wilbur and the rest of the administration promises development for the future," Mr. Sniffen added. "If we can get the Indian service reconstructed on a modern basis as a welfare problem, commissioners can come and go and the work will go on progessively."

In a morning business session officers were elected. Mrs. Otto Heinigke of Brooklyn, the president, who presided yesterday, was re-elected, as were most of the other officers.

The morning meeting was followed by a luncheon, at which Mr. Sniffen spoke. Other speakers included Major Gen. Hugh L. Scott, U. S. A., retired; Mrs. L. B. Lillie, president of the Springfield branch of the organization; the Rev. W. A. Petzoldt, an Indian missionary in Montana; the Rev. Dr. Thomas C. Moffatt, secretary of the Indian Missions of America, and Ataloa, an Indian girl of the Chickasaw tribe of Oklahoma.

SAYS ART HERE VIES WITH THAT IN PARIS

Dr. Aubert, Louvre Curator, Is Amazed by Wealth of Our Museums and Libraries.

STRESSES CULTURAL LINKS

Bonds Between His Country and Ours Constantly Strengthened, He Tells French Institute.

Cultural exchanges between France and the United States to strengthen the bonds of sympathy and understanding between the peoples of the two nations were reviewed by Dr. Marcel Aubert, associate curator of the Louvre at Paris, and exchange professor at Harvard this year, who was a guest of honor yesterday at the annual luncheon at the Ritz-Carlton of the Museum of French Art of the French Institute in the United States.

"I have been amazed by your museums and libraries and the wealth of French cultural associations which you in this country possess," he said. "I must admit that there are certain branches of French art which are better represented in your country than they are in France.

"For our part, we are yearly welcoming to France larger and larger delegations of American students. We are facilitating their entry into France, and at the Sorbonne and many other French institutions of learning we are admitting them on the same basis as we admit the native-born student.

"We are pursuing this program because we believe that an understanding of the culture of a nation is the best basis for international harmony and sympathy and friendship."

Maxime Mongendre, French Consul General at New York and another of the guests of honor, paid a tribute to Ormond G. Smith, president of the institute, who was prevented by illness from presiding at the luncheon. He referred to Mr. Smith's purchase of the property adjoining the present quarters of the institute and museum, where a fourteen-story building will be erected, the lower floors of which will house the expanding activities of the organization.

"The new Franco-American humanism, which is the result of the efforts of such men as Mr. Smith and Professor Louis Mercier of Harvard," he said, "is in accord with the best traditions established by French and American heroes during the long period of amicable relations between the two nations."

Other speakers included General Andrew Moses, representing General Hanson E. Ely, and Captain F. W. Grant, United States Navy. Ormond V. Gould, vice president of the institute, presided. The other guests of honor were General Cornelius Vanderbilt, Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, Mrs. Pierre Cartier, Mrs. Chester Dale and Miss Belle Greene.

SUICIDE'S 'SYMPATHY' WILLED TO CREDITORS

'Body to Science and Soul to Andrew W. Mellon' are 'Bequests' of Man in Milwaukee.

MILWAUKEE, Wis., Dec. 7 (AP).—Directing that "my body should go to science, my soul to Andrew W. Mellon and sympathy to my creditors," Wellington Lytle, 25, shot and killed himself in a hotel room today.

Lytle, believed to be from California, had only four cents. In a note he directed authorities to return to its owner the pistol he used. His body was not to be removed from the hotel room "until my rent is up."

PROTEST JAILINGS IN INDIA.

Liberals Sign Complaint in Behalf of Political Prisoners.

A protest against the British Labor Government's policy of imprisoning political objectors in India was sent yesterday to the British Ambassador in Washington and to the Secretary of State for India in London, on behalf of the International Committee for Political Prisoners.

The protest was signed by a group of Liberals, including Robert Morss Lovett of the University of Chicago, the Rev. Sydney Strong of Seattle, Joseph S. Matthews, secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation; Mrs. Florence Kelley, secretary of the National Consumers' League; Mary White Ovington of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Lewis Gannett, Bolton Hall, Roger N. Baldwin and the Rev. Gilbert Howell.

It embodied a resolution adopted at a meeting of the International Committee for Political Prisoners at which the present trials of independence advocates and the alleged detention of scores of labor and peasant leaders in India without trial formed part of the discussion.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

HOOVER STAND BASIS OF STATE DRY FIGHT

Anti-Saloon League and W. C. T. U. to Demand Albany Act in Line With President's Policy.

DEFEAT APPEARS CERTAIN

Caucus Action With Expulsion From Party of Republicans Who Bolt May Be Sought.

Encouraged by President Hoover's stand in favor of cooperation by the States with the Federal authorities in the enforcement of prohibition, the New York Anti-Saloon League and the Women's Christian Temperance Union are preparing for a drive on the Legislature to force the enactment at next year's session of a new State prohibition enforcement act to take the place of the Mullan-Gage law, repealed in 1923.

President Hoover is expected to emphasize his demand for enforcement by the States under the concurrent clause in the dry law in a special message soon to be sent to Congress. On the strength of this the advocates of State enforcement will urge upon the legislative leaders of the President's own party, which is in control in both branches of the Legislaure, that in order to keep in step with the Republican policies at Washington they must pass a State enforcement law.

This, however, will be merely a preliminary move to be followed by others of a more drastic character. A survey of the list of members of the incoming Legislature has already made it clear to the dry leaders that the outlook for favorable action on a State enforcement bill, even in the Assembly, which until recently had been consideerd a Gibraltar of the dry cause, is anything but promising. At the legislative session this year the drys found themselves two votes short of the 76 necessary to pass a measure in the lower house. Next year, it would appear, they will be short three, possibly more. The Senate is wet and from all appearances will remain so in the 1930 Legislature. With the exception of one or two seats the Senate personnel remains unchanged.

Renewed Drive Expected.

In view of the fact, however, that a considerable majority of the Republicans in both the Senate and Assembly are dry, the legislative leaders fully expect a renewed dry campaign. The drys are expected to demand that an enforcement bill be made a Republican measure, in line with the President's stand, and that the penalty for bolting be expulsion from the party.

It is known that Republican leaders already have been sounded by the drys. There is reason to believe also that the result has not been encouraging to the drys. Similar demands have always been turned down in the past on the ground that to make prohibition a caucus matter would force Republican members representing wet constituencies to bolt and leave the drys no better off.

There is an uneasy feeling among up-State Republicans, who are dry themselves, that failure to accede to the drys demands this year, with a Gubernatorial election in prospect, might have drastic consequences. It is half expected that prohibition advocates may threaten a third ticket. They could make good this threat, as they did in 1926 when James W. Wadsworth was seeking a third term in the United States Senate, and it undoubtedly would prove as disastrous to the Republicans in 1930 as it did then.

The prevalent belief, however, is that the Anti-Saloon League will not carry matters to such an extreme, especially since the alternative would be a Democratic victory that could do the drys no good.

Vote on Dry Measure Assured.

The Republican legislative program contemplates no attempt to stifle dry legislation by having it referred to committee and letting it remain there. The representatives of the dry organizations have been assured by William J. Maier, chairman of the Republican State Committee, that if his recommendations prevail, as they undoubtedly will, the prospective enforcement bill will be brought out in both the Senate and Assembly at an early date for a vote.

It is regarded as doomed to defeat in the Senate. In the Assembly all the sixty-four Democratic members next year are pledged to the wet cause and thirteen of the eighty-six Republican members won their seats against aggressive opposition from the Anti-Saloon League. The opposition was due to their failure to support anti-saloon legislation this year, and in the circumstances even the drys are not looking for a change in their attitude. That would leave only seventy-three Republican Assemblymen and some of these have not gone on record.

With the Anti-Saloon League measure defeated at an early stage of next year's session the Republicans will be prepared to consider any compromise the drys may propose after again receiving convincing evidence that a "straight" State enforcement bill cannot be passed. The Republican leaders of the Legislature would welcome the introduction of some dry measure which it would be possible for both dry Republican members and those representing liberal constituencies to support.

In connection with this Republicans recalled the "county option" bill, proposed as a compromise at the session this year by H. Edmund Machold, the late Republican State Chairman. This measure would provide a way for dry counties, subject to approval at a popular referendum, to establish local machinery for prohibition enforcement. The bill was made a Republican party measure in the Senate, but proved unacceptable to Speaker McGinnies. But for the opposition of Mr. McGinnies, the "county option" bill would have been passed by the Legislature this year and sent to Governor Roosevelt. Many Republicans believed that, while the Governor had gone on record in opposition to State enforcement, he would be in a position consistently to approve a measure providing for home rule in the enforcement of the dry law. Mr. McGinnies made it clear that personally he regarded the "county option" bill as ineffective, but said that if the measure proved acceptable to the drys, he would withdraw his opposition.

NEW BRITISH PLANE METAL.

Nickel Chromium Steel Expected to Outlast Hulls of Ships.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 7.—The invention of a new nickel chromium steel which is increased in hardness in rolling into thin plates, has enabled British flying-boat constructors, it is asserted, to build hulls which are practically indestructible by corrosion in sea water.

Hitherto duralumin sheet has been employed, but although great advances have been made in promoting its under-water life, it soon decays. Flying boats built with the new stainless steel, it is estimated, will have a longer hull life than a ship, and without the continual repainting associated with marine vessels.

DRY LAW ARRESTS 8,265 IN NEW YORK

Legal Alcohol Production Increases.

The production of alcohol by legal processes is increasing. Making his annual report today, Prohibition Commissioner Doran disclosed that 200,832,051 proof gallons were produced in the fiscal year ending last June 30, and that figure was 31,682,051 more than the output of the preceding twelvemonth period.

During the year 8,892,247 gallons were withdrawn from warehouses after tax payments, an increase of 217,266 gallons as compared with the previous year. Withdrawals for tax-free purposes, including denaturation, for export, for use by the government, hospitals, laboratories, colleges and other educational institutions, amounted to 185,650,902 gallons, an increase of 22,732,825 gallons.

During the year a total of 1,616,658 gallons of distilled spirits, including brandy, were withdrawn from bonded warehouses, an increase of 3,860 gallons, while there were 9,149,440 more gallons of cereal beverages produced than in the year previous.

During the year 509 wineries, a decrease of 56, operated and produced 11,381,990 gallons of wine, an increase of 6,459,373 gallons.

The quantity of wine removed on payment of tax for non-beverage and sacramental purposes totaled 3,004,200 gallons, while on last June 30 there were 23,138,754 gallons of wine in warehouses.

SEES DANGER TO LABOR IN PLEDGE ON WAGES

Workers Bureau in Letter Says Promise Not to Ask Increases May Be 'Embarrassing.'

Possible danger lurking in labor's "pledge" to President Hoover not to press for higher wages at this time except in those cases where such action has been decided upon is commented upon in the monthly economic news letter of the Labor Bureau, Inc.

"If the industrial depression goes in any marked degree beyond what is at present expected, it is foolish for labor to hope that employers will not do everything in their power to reduce wage rates; for their promises do not bind them in such a contingency," the letter states.

"We do not say this will happen, but we point out that there is nothing in the employers' 'pledge' to prevent it.

"On the other hand, labor has given up its right to seek higher wages. While this may only be an academic surrender in most instances—for wage increases are difficult to obtain in times of business uncertainties—yet it may prove embarrassing. There may be businesses and industries that will not suffer, even if there is a general slump, but it may be difficult for labor to convince employers, arbitrators and the general public that it is entitled to take notice of such exceptions."

According to the news letter, seventy-five wage increases and only two decreases were reported during November.

FINAL ORDER GIVEN IN N. Y. C. MERGER

Road Wins I. C. C. Authorization to Assume Michigan Central and Big Four Obligations.

OPPOSITION IS OVERRULED

Contention Was Made That Rents Proposed Did Not Conform With Laws of Ohio.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—In a final order winding up the merger by the New York Central of its subsidiaries, the Big Four and the Michigan Central systems, the Interstate Commerce Commission today authorized the New York Central, as lessee of the two systems, to assume the obligations of the merged companies, involving a total of securities of $311,561,329 and annual dividends and interest aggregating $14,104,864.

In granting the order, the commission overruled the contentions of attorneys for the New York Central Securities Corporation that the rents proposed to be paid under leases for the Michigan Central and Big Four lines in Ohio did not conform with the requirements of the Ohio laws dealing with railroads, which, they contended, require that the income from the proposed leases should at least equal dividend requirements on the stock of the merged companies.

The commission disposed of this contention by declaring that until the courts should decide whether the New York Central, Big Four and Michigan Central have adequate corporate authority under Ohio law to enter into the leases, the commission would be of the opinion that it had adequate authority to grant the authority for execution of the leases which was sought.

Order Ends Long Battle.

The roads included in the Big Four system, whose securities are affected by the order, include the Cincinnati Northern and the Evansville, Indianapolis & Terre Haute Railroads.

Those in the Michigan Central system included the Grand River Valley, Detroit & Bay City, Kalamazoo & South Haven, Jackson, Lansing & Saginaw, Michigan Air Line, Joliet & Northern Indiana, Bay City & Battle Creek, Toledo, Canada Southern & Detroit and Chicago, Kalamazoo & Saginaw.

The order entered today closes the long-drawn battle between the New York Central and the protective committee for the common stock holders of the Big Four, which, until arrangements were made for sale of their holdings to the New York Central, opposed the application. It supplements the previous order of the commission granting the application of the New York Central for unification of its system by merger of the Big Four and Michigan Central lines.

New Central Bonds Authorized.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP).—Authorization for the New York Central Railroad to assume liability for $5,895,000 gold certificates was given today by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The securities will be second equipment trust of 1929 4½ per cent equipment trust gold certificates. They will be issued by the Guaranty Trust Company of New York, as trustee, under an agreement to be dated Dec. 1, 1929, and sold at not less than 97.02 per cent of par and accrued dividends. The issue was asked in connection with the purchase of new equipment by the railroad.

STRESSES ABOLITION OF CASH PAYROLLS

Professor Moley Says Payment by Checks Is Only Method of Curbing Banditry.

The substitution of pay checks for cash payrolls was urged yesterday by Professor Raymond Moley, head of the department of criminal law at Columbia University, as the only method of curbing payroll banditry, which he said continues to be one of the outstanding and costly criminal activities in the United States. Professor Moley is chairman of a special committee appointed last January by the National Crime Commission to investigate the payroll hold-up problem.

Virtually every large American city has experienced such robberies, attended by murder or injury or both this year, he asserted, adding: "A check of 207 crimes of this nature occuring during the twelve-month period ended Sept. 30 last shows that at least twelve persons were killed outright and six died from gun-shot or other wounds received while attempting to fight off bandits."

During the twelve months, Professor Moley said, upward of sixty men and women were shot, slugged or otherwise injured, hundreds of women employes of plants and offices were terrified and nine persons were kidnapped and later thrown from automobiles in payroll robberies.

"In the metropolitan area of New York alone," said the professor, "in the period mentioned, newspapers described eighty-five payroll hold-ups, the majority being committed by armed gangs. Fifty-three took place in New York City, twenty in Brooklyn, three in Newark, two in Hoboken and one each in Yonkers, Long Island City, Weehawken, Elizabeth and Woodside."

Chicago, he said, led the Middle West, with seventeen payroll crimes, St. Louis, with seven, coming second. Philadelphia, in the twelve-month period, he said, had sixteen payroll crimes, five each being reported in Boston and New Orleans.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

NELSON NEAR CRASH, DROPPED A MESSAGE

Air Squadron Hovers Over Grave.

Special to The New York Times.

PLAINFIELD, N. J., Dec. 7.—As the funeral cortège of Thomas P. Nelson, air mail pilot, who crashed at Chagrin Falls, Pa., last week, reached the Hillside Cemetery near here this afternoon a squadron of airplanes came up under a bleak and overcast sky, led by Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh, a former flying mate of the dead pilot. During the graveside rites the squadron dropped flowers and dipped wings in final salute to a lost comrade.

Colonel Lindbergh, the leader, carried the manoeuvres through to a finish and after the burial was started the squadron disappeared toward Hadley Field, the home port of the National Air Transport.

Services were held for Nelson in the funeral establishment of A. M. Rumson & Sons here. They were conducted by the Rev. John Y. Brooks of the Trinity Reform Church and the Rev. L. W. Warren of the First Presbyterian Church of Plainfield. Among the pallbearers were William Maxwell, division superintendent of the National Air Transport, and Philip Love, a former flying mate of Lindbergh and Nelson in the mail service before the former's flight to Paris.

Nelson's widow, his parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. T. Nelson of Wilton Junction, Iowa, and other relatives were surrounded by more than 500 members of the aviation industry—pilots, operators, financiers and companions.

At the cemetery, shortly after the burial services were closed, another squadron of airplanes from the army post at Miller Field, S. I., flew over the grave in a last salute. One of the mail planes of the National Air Transport stood guard in the air over the grave until after darkness set in.

ASKS FEDERAL AID IN CIGARETTE WAR

Leader of Independents Says Price Cut Threatens Ruin to Thousands of Small Stores.

SEES TRADE LAW VIOLATED

Urges Retailers to Keep 15-Cent Rate and Predicts End of Reduction in a Week.

Thousands of small retail dealers in cigarettes are in danger of being forced out of business by the "cigarette war," according to a statement yesterday by Benjamin Gorlitzer, president of the Independent Retail Tobacconists' Association, which claims 360 active members and 2,000 "non-active." He announced that an appeal for assistance would be made to the Federal Trade Commission, and, in a letter to members, urged them to maintain the 15-cent price on the brands which chains have recently reduced to 12 cents.

"To do otherwise," he wrote, "means virtual elimination of the independent dealer. Impress your customers with the unfairness of an economic scheme which permits large moneyed groups to war for supremacy at the expense of the independent. This ruinous competition cannot continue indefinitely."

Cites Wholesale Prices.

He declared that at $6.40 per thousand, the wholesale price agreed upon by the manufacturers of the popular brands two months ago after a period of price-cutting, the cost to the independent dealers was 12.8 cents per pack plus one-third cent per pack for a book of matches, and that the total, including shop overhead, was 14½ cents, making the present cut-rate retail price of 12 cents per pack below the actual cost to the independent dealers. The large retailers obtain the advantage of a 10 per cent discount allowed to direct purchasers and a further discount of 2 per cent for cash.

"Competition of this unfair nature seems to me to be un-American and rotten business," said Mr. Gorlitzer. "I cannot for the life of me, no matter how hard I delve into this problem, see how the Federal, State and city officials can sit back without noticing this alarming condition which, if continued for any length of time, would drive out thousands and thousands of independent tobacco dealers throughout the Union.

"What is in back of this situation? Are the big money interests trying to gobble up the entire industry to the detriment, loss and woe of the thousands of dealers that are striving to make an honest and fair living for themselves and their families, or are these corporations trying to cover up their shortages, their laxity in paying dividends and make the minority stockholders of these respective corporations shoulder the losses after they have covered themselves? Or are they trying to shake down the manufacturers?

"It is a known fact that neither the United Cigar stores nor the Schulte stores have paid their last dividend, and when we consider that it was under unfair competitive conditions that they found it necessary to pass these dividends up, how can they justify themselves so that the stockholder will feel that regardless of these losses the actual capital will not be impaired?

Will Ask Federal Aid.

"In behalf of the Independent Retail Tobacconists' Association, I, as its president, will see to it that the proper complaint is made to the Federal Trade Commission; that an investigation be started by that office to review the circumstances existing, looking into whether or not this is within the scope of unfair competition and restraint of trade."

Mr. Gorlitzer went on to assert: "It is the purpose and intention of these chain stores, the Atlantic and Pacific and the Liggett drug stores, to hand out these bargains—if they may be called such—in order to get the public into their stores with the idea of selling them something else to compensate for the losses they are admittedly taking on the sale of cigarettes."

Mr. Gorlitzer said more retailers had failed during the past six months than in the last ten years. He predicted that the price would be back to 15 cents per pack within a week.

Customers of United Cigar stores noted yesterday that in some cases clerks did not supply matches unless so requested and that where two packs were bought by a purchaser only one card of matches was given.

Retailers said yesterday that five instead of four brands, were now selling at two packs for a quarter. They are Camels, Chesterfields, Lucky Strikes, Old Golds and Three Kings.

K. OF C. GROUPS GROWS.

Myhan Circle's Third and Largest Sector to Be Invested Today.

In the presence of national, State and local officers and members of the Knights of Columbus, the third sector of Myhan Circle Columbian Squires will be officially invested this afternoon at 3 o'clock, the ceremonies taking place at Myhan Hall in the K. of C. Club Hotel, Eighth Avenue and Fifty-first Street. Myhan Circle is the junior branch of the organization's New York Chapter, which includes forty-two Manhattan and Bronx councils.

With the addition of the group to be received today, the third sector will become the largest in the United States, although it is less than two years since the parent organization sponsored the movement. After the ritual there will be addresses by State Deputy Walter A. Lynch, ranking executive of the order in New York State; Thomas J. Gray, chairman of the local chapter; John J. Contway of the National Boy Life Bureau at New Haven, Conn., and John J. Costello, chairman of the boys' work committee of the chapter.

Total	$61,850,000

From the ranks of the Progressives there were rumors of possible efforts to amend the resolution on the Senate floor. Senator Nye of North Dakota said he understood an amendment would be offered to make the law applicable to the calendar year 1930 instead of 1929. He added that he would not be the author of the amendment, but did not disclose the name of the Senator who may make this move.

There was also some talk of an amendment to have the reduction affect 1929 and 1930, but the understanding is that Senators who had favored such an amendment, after a study of the situation, have decided not to offer it.

PARADE FOR TAX CUTS.

Stage Stars March to Capitol and Hold Rally at Congress's Doors.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP).—Stars of the stage and men active in the business, civic and religious life of the country paraded up historic Pennsylvania Avenue today to plead for a reduction of taxes at the doors of Congress.

Gathered from many sections by the Hearst newspapers, the celebrities spoke before a sizable throng in front of the Capitol as legislative leaders gave attention to their pleas and promised relief so far as possible.

On the fringe of the crowd stood a truck bearing the slogan "Taxes and Surtaxes on Earned Incomes Can and Should Be Substantially Reduced Below the Rate on Unearned Incomes." It held bundles of petitions asking for a reduction of the tax burden.

As soon as the arguments got under way, Ed Wynn, Comedian, had something to say about the proposition.

"I feel like a piece of carpet I am so kept down by taxes," he said, adding that the theatrical business was "looking up."

"By that," he explained, "I mean it's flat on its back."

Mae Murray, here from Hollywood, told what she thought about the present taxes, and Anna Fitzhugh, grand opera singer, and former Mayor Hylan of New York, supported her words.

SAVES OFFICER IN RIVER.

Lieut. T. H. Stanley Commended for Rescue in Nicaragua.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—The War Department was informed today by its special engineering battalion surveying the proposed interoceanic canal route in Nicaragua, that Lieutenant T. H. Stanley, attached to the battalion, has been commended in official orders for saving Lieutenant W. O. Van Giesen from drowning.

Both officers, heavily equipped, were engaged in a reconnaissance through swamp and jungle for embankment sites crossing the San Francisco River. Because of fifteen inches of rain in two days, they were forced to wade most of the way through swampy areas and to swim swollen streams. In one of these crossings Lieutenant Stanley, who led the way, turned to see Lieutenant Van Giesen swept down stream and disappear. Lieutenant Van Giesen became entangled below the surface in snags and roots. Lieutenant Stanley jumped in and extricated his brother officer.

America is moving fast today. The world of creation is fertile. Styles come and go almost every week. No longer can we think in the terms of spring and summer and fall. Our swifter moving minds need speedier expression.

I. Miller is not found wanting in this new, faster world of fashion. This month and next month and the month after you may expect totally new style features within the I. Miller shops.

Illustrated, for instance, are some of the new December models . . . the diagonal stitched slipper, the serpent front-strap, the interlaced applique and others which have been purposely designed for wearing with newer frocks of 1929 and 1930.

Tomorrow . . . and every day thereafter during December, you may see these new effects in actuality . . . in our windows . . . and in our shops.

These December Styles will not be included in our January Semi-Annual Clearance—Their prices will be maintained.

CRAIN ASKED TO PUT WOMEN ON STAFF

District Attorney-Elect Silent on Plea of Magistrate Norris at Dinner in His Honor.

PROMISES TO "GO SLOWLY"

Will Make No Sweeping Changes In Office at First, He Declares—Bespeaks Public Support.

About 500 persons attended a luncheon at the Park Lane Hotel yesterday to honor former Supreme Court Justice Thomas C. T. Crain, District Attorney-elect. The luncheon was given by the Women's Non-Partisan Committee for Mr. Crain's election, of which Mrs. John Jerome Rooney was the chairman.

Two women, Magistrate Jean H. Norris and Mrs. A. Frank Imhof, president of the Women's Democratic Club, suggested to Mr. Crain that he appoint one or more women as Assistant District Attorneys when he takes office in January. Mr. Crain made no comment on their suggestions.

He did say, however, that it was not his intention to make any sweeping changes in the District Attorney's office immediately after he takes charge. He will proceed "slowly," he said, in changing "any system that may prevail" in the office. He added to this statement a plea for "generous leniency" in the public attitude toward the office.

All too frequently, he said, a great office fails in its work not because of inefficiency on the part of the incumbent, but because it has not the proper public esteem and regard. He asked that the public spur his assistants to work diligently by praising them "whenever possible."

It will be his aim, he said, to make the District Attorney's office "the people's institution for the betterment of conditions." He will seek to promote the efficiency of the office, he declared, by building up between himself and his assistants "trust and confidence" and will ask that public approval fall "upon those who do work."

Magistrate Norris made her suggestion while praising Mr. Crain for his recent notice in the Law Journal in which he invited lawyers to apply for positions as Assistant District Attorneys. "I hope some of our women lawyers have filed applications," she said.

Referring to Magistrate Norris's statement, Mrs. Imhof said later: "I hope that after the first of the year, we will be able to congratulate Mr. Crain on appointing one or more women among his assistants."

Supreme Court Justice Edward R. Finch, speaking at the luncheon, praised Mr. Crain for the interest which he said the latter had taken in building up a high standard of morals among the young. The lack of religious education in the public schools, due to the separation of Church and State in the United States, makes special efforts to instill morals in boys and girls imperative, he declared.

Other speakers at the luncheon included Supreme Court Justice Curtis A. Peters; Miss Ellen A. G. Phillips, District Superintendent of Schools; Mrs. Maxwell Hall Elliot, a trustee of Hunter College; Mrs. Bertha Rembaugh, Miss Grace Ludlow Kelly, Mrs. Joseph W. Ferris and Mrs. Jack W. Loeb.

Furniture on View Tomorrow.

The Plaza Art Galleries, Inc., announce an exhibition and sale of English, French and Italian furniture, to be shown tomorrow until the day of sale on Wednesday through Dec. 18. There is a set of five carved mahogany Chippendale dining chairs, an eighteenth century; a seventeenth century armorial tapestry, a collection of old silver with some Georgian pieces.

GOV. ROOSEVELT TO GET OVATION IN CHICAGO

Luncheon Arranged for Tuesday to Show His Popularity in Illinois.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Dec. 7.—The greatest ovation for a visiting Democrat since Alfred E. Smith came to Chicago is predicted for next Tuesday for Governor Roosevelt of New York.

While the chief purpose of his visit is to address the Commercial Club at its annual banquet that evening, he has been invited by Thomas F. Donovan, Democratic National Committeeman and chairman of the State Committee, to attend a luncheon intended to show the popularity of the Empire State Executive in Illinois. More than 1,200 reservations have already been received.

Colonel Albert A. Sprague will act as toastmaster and in addition to Mr. Donovan and Edward J. Glackin there will be at the speakers' table Jouett Shouse, chairman of the National Democratic Committee; W. G. Bierd, James Hamilton Lewis, Edward N. Hurley, Frederick H. Rawson, Bruce A. Campbell, Charles Piez, Melvin A. Traylor, James E. Gorman and D. F. Kelly.

Soon after arriving Governor Roosevelt will hold an informal reception at the Hotel Sherman.

BROTHER DECLARES BRANCATI WAS SLAIN

Says Five Men Forced Doctor to Yield Fortune, Then Killed Him in New Jersey.

CALLS ON WHALEN TO ACT

Ex-Italian Officer Also Will Visit Pecora Tomorrow to Press Demand for New Inquiry.

Convinced that Dr. Charles Brancati, who disappeared more than a year ago, was murdered, his brother, Captain Thomas Brancati, a retired officer of Italian Carabineri, called upon Police Commissioner Whalen yesterday to demand action.

Evidence uncovered by Captain Brancati since his arrival in this country a month ago to take up the search for the missing physician leads him to believe that five men forced Dr. Brancati to turn over his fortune to them and then took him to a farm in New Jersey, where they killed him.

Commissioner Whalen was not in his office when Captain Brancati called with his brother, Ernest, to lay his findings before the police. The captain, however, left a memorandum written in Italian with Inspector Harry H. Lobdell containing an outline of his investigation and made an appointment to discuss the matter with Mr. Whalen tomorrow.

Mr. Whalen, upon returning to Police Headquarters, received the memorandum. He had not had time to study it carefully, however, and until he had done so, he would make no comment, he said.

Ernest Brancati said last night also that he and the captain were to see Assistant District Attorney Pecora tomorrow.

"There is no doubt about it," he declared. "My brother was killed and robbed."

$225,000 Withdrawal Puzzling.

Dr. Brancati, reputedly wealthy, disappeared from his home, the old Gouverneur Morris homestead in the Throgs Neck section of the Bronx, on Nov. 19 1928. Shortly before he dropped out of sight a Bronx grand jury which had heard evidence linking the physician with an illegal operation failed to indict.

Immediately after his disappearance, Dr. Brancati's account of about $234,000 with Hardy & Co. was depleted by approximately $225,000 upon the order of one Luigi Romano, a somewhat shadowy figure who had obtained a power of attorney. The money, after being withdrawn from the brokerage account was deposited in a Mulberry Street bank and subsequently withdrawn, supposedly by Luigi Romano.

Dr. Brancati's brothers, Ernest, Ercole and Oreste, did not report his disappearance until April 25 after a private search of their own. They said their fears had been somewhat allayed at first by the receipt of letters and telegrams supposedly signed by Dr. Brancati saying that he was enjoying himself and advising them not to worry. At last, however, they were convinced that the signatures were forged.

Officials Drop Inquiries.

They then appealed to the police and to District Attorney McGeehan of the Bronx, who summoned several witnesses in an attempt to unearth some clue to the doctor's whereabouts. Witnesses were found who told of seeing Dr. Brancati in New York months after he was supposed to have dropped out of sight, and Mr. McGeehan closed the investigation. Later at the instance of the brothers, Mr. McGeehan reopened his inquiry, only to pass it on to District Attorney Banton, declaring that if any crime had been committed it was in Manhattan rather than the Bronx.

Meanwhile Federal authorities were delving into the affairs of Dr. Brancati on the theory that his disappearance might have been connected in some manner with the activities of Arnold Rothstein in the narcotic traffic. He was known to have been friendly with the murdered gambler and he vanished about the time the Federal authorities were seizing Rothstein's papers. Dr. Brancati also was a friend of the late Frank M. Ferrari, head of the defunct City Trust Company, and was indebted to the bank when it failed. No definite evidence linking Dr. Brancati with the activities of Rothstein or the failure of the bank was found, however.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

DU PONT WINS POINT IN FLORIDA LAND SUIT

Court Grants Plea of Ex-Senator and Co-Defendants to Dismiss One of Three Causes of Action.

General T. Coleman du Pont, former Senator from Delaware, and other defendants in a suit by ninety-three persons who bought property at Boca Raton, Fla., from the Mizner Development Corporation, to recover $1,450,000 because of the alleged acts of the defendants, won an important point yesterday when Supreme Court Justice Peters granted their application to dismiss one of the three causes of action because the facts alleged were insufficient. The other defendants affected by the decision are Jesse L. Livermore, Louis H. Bean, Hollyday Meeds and Ward A. Wickwire.

Justice Peters said the cause of action objected to alleged that the Mizner Development Corporation was organized in Florida in April, 1925, to acquire land and sell lots to the public and that prior to August of that year the defendants had inquired and learned that the company's officers were unreliable and were managing it with a disregard of the truth of representations they were making to induce the public to buy lots, but that they became directors regardless of what they learned. It was alleged that after the defendants had become directors the defendants could have prevented the officers from engaging in an elaborate advertising and development campaign in which it was represented that the company "had ample resources and had the backing of social and financial leaders," which the defendants knew were false and which they could have corrected or prevented, thus saving the plaintiffs from investing in "worthless land."

In dismissing the cause of action, Justice Peters holds that the defendants were under no obligation to persons who were neither stockholders nor officers of the corporation. The decision leaves two causes of action, one of which alleges that the defendants took part in a conspiracy to commit fraud, while the second sets forth the alleged fraud of the defendants resulting in damages of the sums the plaintiffs invested.

THE LONG AND SHORT OF STEMWARE FASHIONS

Here is a simple rule to follow in choosing appropriate glassware. When "tails" are worn, stems are long. When "Tux" are worn, stems are gone. Or almost gone, we are forced to add . . . though it does spoil the poetry. Formal glassware is also noted for its consistent use of crystal . . . while less formal glass is vibrant with lovely color.

THE LONG . . .

Fine Steuben glass . . . glittering crystal reeded with black. Goblets . . . . . 66.00 doz.

Crystal glass of aristocratic cutting. Just touch the rim and hear it sing. Goblets . . . . . 110.00 doz.

The rounded crystal bowl on a slender stem is distinctly Continental. Goblets . . . . . 50.00 doz.

Crystal, executed with airy grace in both line and decoration. Goblets . . . . . 25.00 doz.

THE SHORT . . .

Fostoria crystal glass . . . lined with black . . . stands on a gleaming black base. Goblets . . . 17.50 doz.

The glorious ruby hue of this glass is irresistible. Goblets . . . . . 20.00 doz.

Amethyst on a crystal base . . . a most adaptable color combination. Goblets . . . . . 12.00 doz.

Blue was never more lovely than in this goblet of rich translucent glass. Goblets . . . . . 6.00 doz.

NEW 'HOME OF LAW' HAILED BY JURISTS

Cornerstone for $1,100,000 County Lawyers' Building Is Laid by W. N. Cromwell.

DEDICATED TO FRIENDSHIP

Dowling, Manton and Crane Stress Bar's Need for Culture and Helpfulness to Young Attorneys.

The cornerstone of the New York County Lawyers' Association Building, at 12-26 Vesey Street, opposite St. Paul's Church, was laid yesterday afternoon by William Nelson Cromwell, president of the association, who contributed $404,000 toward the $1,100,000 project.

Several hundred lawyers crowded about a platform to the right of the main entrance to listen to addresses by Judge Frederick E. Crane of the New York Court of Appeals, Presiding Justice Victor J. Dowling of the Appellate Division, First Department; Senior Judge Martin T. Manton of the United States Circuit Court, Second Circuit; Corporation Counsel Arthur J. W. Hilly and Cass Gilbert, architect who designed the building.

The speakers were introduced by Martin Conboy, chairman of the building committee. Mr. Cromwell, who delivered the concluding address, recalled the Colonial history of lower Manhattan and urged respect and veneration for the past.

"It is my dream," he said, "that this home of law become an institute, not in the cold sense of lectures and teaching but in the warmth of goodfellowship, friendship."

The building, four stories high, is in the Georgian style, designed to express the dignity of the law. It will contain an extensive library. No space has been provided for a restaurant, domicile or commercial purpose of any kind.

Justice Dowling urged that the building be made a material means to the end of maintaining the morale of the bar by strengthening the courage and ideals of young lawyers. "My hope is that in this building the young men of the profession will feel at home, that they will get the friendly and fatherly advice of those who have gone through the furnace and come out unscathed," he added.

He also emphasized the duty of older members of the bar "whose lines were cast in more pleasant places" to create for the younger members an "ethical and educational background."

"There never was a time when position at the bar called for greater knowledge or greater intellectual grasp," Judge Manton said. "Commercial problems have reached such magnitude and intricacy that trials and advice of legal counsel call for the highest mental capacity. Never was there greater need for a wide culture and full acquaintance with history, economics and sociological science. When lawyers are found not thus equipped, you find them working in competition with the wage of the bricklayer."

Judge Crane predicted that "this building will represent to the community that the law is meant to be a useful profession; helpful to the people, seeking to lighten, not to increase their burdens, and the building will suggest to our members that the only great danger lurking in our midst is that we imperceptibly are apt to fall behind the times. Too often our law becomes a theory, drawn out of books and research, instead of a ready rule of practical application."

In the cornerstone were placed copies of the Congressional Directory, the Legislative Manual of the State of New York, the Manual of the City of New York, a brochure describing the new building, the New York County Lawyers' Association Year Book, a collection of gold and silver coins of the mintage of 1929 and a copy of each of the daily newspapers published in this city yesterday.

Togo, Dog Hero of Nome Trek, Put to Death; Husky Taken to Museum for Niche of Fame

BRUNSWICK, Me., Dec. 7 (AP).—Togo is dead. The big, shaggy Siberian husky which four years ago raced across the Alaskan wastes at the head of a dog team with serum for the diphtheria-stricken inhabitants of Nome went painlessly across the Big Divide to the dog's Valhalla on Thursday night.

Grown too old and too slow for the trail, Togo two years ago was presented to Mrs. E. P. Ricker Jr. of Poland Springs, Me., by Leonard Seppala, his master, who had given credit to Togo for leading him safely across miles of frozen snow to Nome on their memorable dash.

Mrs. Ricker, wishing to have Togo's splendid body preserved while he was still alert of ear and poise and before he had become subject to the infirmities of age, decided to have him painlessly put to death and his body given to the Peabody Museum at New Haven, Conn., for mounting.

On Thursday Ralph Morrill, taxidermist of the Peabody Museum, called at Poland Springs, got Togo and brought him here, where, assisted by a veterinarian he put the 16-year-old dog to sleep. Today the body was taken to New Haven by automobile.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Dec. 7 (AP).—The body of Togo arrived here today from Poland Springs, Me., to be enshrined in the Peabody Museum.

Dr. S. C. Ball of the museum, said that Togo would find a prominent niche among the more than seventy specimens of famous dogs in the collection. Preparations were made at once for mounting the animal. It had been intended to cremate Togo and scatter his ashes along the Nome trail, but the plan was reconsidered.

There had been a steady flow of communications to the officers from New York and elsewhere since recent announcement of the museum's plan regarding methods for his death, but the museum officials insisted that Togo's treatment had been humane in every particular.

Togo accepted his fate with the indomitable spirit that had characterized his life in the North. Down over the frosty road from the home of Mrs. E. P. Ricker Jr., his owner, to Brunswick Togo rode. The white drifts formed an appropriate trail to the end of his journey.

ADVISES PIONEERING BY YOUNG ENGINEER

Crosby Field Tells American Society Opportunity Is Better Today Than Ever.

EXPOSITION SETS RECORDS

Attendance and Sales Far Above Previous Years—Four Awards Made for Research.

The greatest opportunity for the young engineer is to pioneer in industry, said Crosby Field, president of the Flakice Corporation, in an address yesterday at the closing session of the meeting of The American Society of Refrigerating Engineers in the Hotel Pennsylvania. Mr. Crosby declared that engineers immediately after leaving college have greater opportunity now than ever to get into business. The possibilities of failure, he asserted, were no greater than they ever were before.

He said the engineer of today might introduce a new method or a new business in a community which has not yet received it, or he might improve an industry by a new process or method of manufacture, financing or selling.

Harry Harrison, chairman of the research committee, awarded four prizes for original research work in refrigeating engineeing to as many students who read the prize-winning papers at the morning sessions.

The winners were Martin R. Borger, Pennsylvania State College; Charles Keevil, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; John C. Reed of the University of Illinois and E. J. Tavanlar of the Sheffield Scientific School at Yale.

All previous records for attendance were broken when the Eighth National Exposition of Power and Mechanical Engineering closed last night at the Grand Central Palace. It was estimated that 120,000 persons visited the 500 exhibits. I. E. Moultrop of the Edison Electric Illuminating Company of Boston, chairman of the advisory committee of the exposition, said:

"The exposition just closed was a success from every viewpoint, particularly from sales and attendance. During the past week there was a spirit of optimism displayed at the show by the exhibitors which was based on a realization that much work will be done in industry in which power is the dominating factor. Orders for machinery were placed which, I am told, ran into millions of dollars."

SEEK RADIO ACCURACY.

Navy Experts Urge Standards in Crystal Quartz Transmitters.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Greater accuracy in maintaining the frequency of radio waves used by the navy was sought at a conference concluded today at the Navy Department, and attended by representatives of radio manufacturing companies, quartz crystal manufacturers, leading engineers and physicists.

Resolutions adopted by the conference recommended a standard terminology in quartz crystal manufacture, standard sizes and shapes for quartz crystal plates used for transmitter control, general specifications outlining requirements of crystal plates used in naval transmitters and a principle of standard crystal control units for various types of naval transmitters, to include a standard circuit, standard type of tube and temperature control units and crystal holders.

HUTCHINS GETS BOWL AT YALE BARN PARTY

Athletes of 1929 See "Most Promising Student" of 1921 Win His "Y" in Life.

STARS AT MONTCLAIR FETE

Football Heroes of Old Hear Plea of Chicago University Head to Keep College Life "Joyful."

Special to The New York Times.

MONTCLAIR, N. J., Dec. 7.—In the presence of more than 300 Yale football stars and enthusiasts who filled Nick Roberts's "Old Yale Barn" to overflowing here tonight, the Montclair Yale Bowl was presented to Robert Maynard Hutchins, who was picked in 1921 as the graduate "most likely to succeed" and was recently installed at the age of 30 as president of the University of Chicago. The bowl is awarded each year to some Yale alumnus who has won his "Y" in life. The presentation is made at the annual barn party given by the Montclair Yale Club to honor the football team.

In addition to the bowl, the Montclair Yale Club presented this year for the first time the Montclair Yale Club, which is to be awarded annually to the Yale undergraduate who has won his "Y" in scholastic pursuits. This cup was presented to Saunders MacLane of Norwalk, Conn. Mr. MacLane, who is a member of the present senior class, has the highest average ever held by a Yale student.

Dr. Hutchins Accepts Bowl.

In his speech accepting the bowl, Dr. Hutchins, who served as secretary of Yale University and dean of the Yale Law School before his appointment to the University of Chicago, expressed the hope that the advance of education would never mean the end of "bright college years with pleasure rife." Current changes may mean a new heaven and a new earth at New Haven, but will surely allow for the maintenance and possibly the improvement of all that the old graduate remembers with affection, he declared.

The presentation of the two awards was witnessed by a notable gathering of Yale alumni from all parts of the United States, including five football captains, Head Coach Mal Stevens and twenty-eight letter men from the present year's squad in addition to many other gridiron heroes of the past.

The five captains present were Firpo Greene, leader of this year's team, Fay Vincent, captain-elect for 1930; Bill Webster, head of the 1927 team; Phil Bunnell, captain in 1926, and Winslow Lovejoy, who led the team of 1924. Among the stars of earlier days were Ducky Pond, Century Milstead, Larry Noble, Charley Comerford, Cobbles Sturhahn and many others.

The party, the ninth of its kind, was one of the largest ever held since Nicholas Roberts, president of S. W. Straus & Co., started the custom. Mr. Roberts presided tonight.

Hails Rockefeller Gift.

In his address Dr. Hutchins also reviewed recent educational advances at Yale.

"These changes mean," he said, "the destruction of departmental barriers which have destroyed the effectiveness of the university in many fields; it means strong departments where some have been weak, but the most important, too, is the probable effect on undergraduate education. Now qualified undergraduate students who know what they want to do will be able to do it if their interest lies in the social field, in junior and senior years.

"If the institute is successful Yale will have made a contribution of the first order to education, graduate and undergraduate, and a beginning on a comparatively new attack on some old and perplexing problems.

"We know that Yale's position in the country depends upon her ability to produce leaders in the life of the country, and we know, too, that in an age as complicated as ours leaders may require brains quite as much as brawn. The spectacle of a group of active and inventive professional schools in close relation to undergraduate schools whose faculty and student personnel are constantly being adjusted to the needs of the present day, where through new devices a social life is developing which will intensify the advantages of that we knew, this spectacle may mean a new heaven and a new earth at New Haven, but it means surely the maintenance and perhaps the improvement of all that we loved in the old Yale."

The party continued to a late hour, various stars and football officials being called on for brief speeches. The guests of honor, this year's football squad, were met in New York upon their arrival from New Haven and escorted by motor through the Holland Tunnel to the barn. Dr. Hutchins and Mr. MacLane were guests at a dinner in the Montclair Golf Club.

Asks Bay Colony Anniversary Coin.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP).—The coinage of 500,000 fifty-cent pieces to commemorate the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Massachusetts Bay Colony is authorized in a bill introduced today by Representative Edith Nourse Rogers, Republican, of Massachusetts. The coins would be issued to the Massachusetts Bay Tercentenary, Inc.

BIGGEST DOCK OPENS AMID DIN OF SIRENS

Borough President J. J. Byrne Officiates at Ceremony for Todd Graving Basin.

LINER ENTERS AT ONCE

Great Repair Structure Can Handle Largest Steamships—More Than 2,000 Witness Event.

The new Todd graving dock for repairing large liners, the largest of its type on the Atlantic seaboard, was opened for service at noon yesterday by James J. Byrne, Borough President of Brooklyn. A few minutes after the dock was opened the water was flooded in and a liner entered to be overhauled.

During the ceremonies, attended by more than 2,000 and broadcast by WNYC, workmen in the Todd yards lined the sides of the dock and the tops of adjacent buildings. They cheered Mr. Todd when he arose to speak.

Mr. Todd told of his plans earlier in life to provide for New York City the best dry-docking facilities in the country. He praised his aides and the workmen who constructed the graving basin.

He paid tribute to the skill of Admiral Frederic R. Harris, retired, the naval architect who designed the dock, and Admiral Harris responded.

Mr. Byrne spoke of the graving dock as a valuable addition to the waterfront facilities offered by the Port of New York and as a further evidence of the supremacy of the port as a commercial focal point.

Others on the list of speakers were Julius H. Cohn, representing the Port of New York Authority, and Chester Kellog, vice president of the Munson Steamship Company.

The first liner to use the dock was the Southern Cross of the Munson Line's South American trade. As she nosed into the opening a score of whistles sounded from the boats anchored near by and tugs of every description within hearing distance. The din was so great that it was heard at South Ferry.

The dock is nearly fifty feet longer than the largest dry dock of the Brooklyn Navy Yard. With an overall length of 750 feet, width at the height of the keel blocks of 90 feet and a top width of 120 feet, the new structure has an outer-gate seat and an inner-gate seat and can accommodate two vessels at one time. It is Admiral Harris's fourteenth masonry dry dock and will enable the Todd corporation to accommodate 175,000 tons of shipping in one day, in the various basins of the company.

HAROLD BAUER PLAYS.

Devotes His Program at Benefit to 19th Century Composers.

Harold Bauer's recital yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the Women's Trade Union League was devoted exclusively to nineteenth century composers from Beethoven to Brahms. The set of melodious and ingratiating waltzes by the latter composer opened the program. Beethoven's late sonata, in A flat, Op. 110, came next, with Schumann's Symphonic Studies, a Chopin nocturne and the Liszt Mephisto Waltz completing the list.

A capacity house gave a warm welcome to the artist, who played his long program with somewhat more of sentiment than he is wont to display and rather less of the power and dignity which he can command. The audience was lavish in its applause and recalled the pianist many times.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

If You Lived in a Town with Only One Good Store, You Would Do All Your Shopping there

....you would buy there everything for all the family. And you would have the advantage of convenience and of familiarity, but you would NOT be able to compare merchandise or prices with other stores.

In New York, You Can "Shop Around"

....because in New York there are all kinds of stores, selling all kinds of things—and at all sorts of prices. You can shop at one place—or many places—and buy at another. You can hunt for bargains, experiment with "bargains" and gradually decide just what a "bargain" is. You can experiment with stores and gradually concentrate most of your buying at the store which has most of the things you want at prices which best fit into your family budget.

But You Want to Buy at a "Good Store"

....because, even though you live in New York, you like to feel at home in a store, you like to know that your store is dependable, that it is a store of established and unblemished reputation, that it strives to sell merchandise at prices which will save you money

HEARN'S is a "Good Store" and it is Famous for Family Buying

....and that is a real test of economy because the shopper who shops for the family has to save money on everything she buys because she buys so much. And

HEARN'S HAS EVERYTHING THE FAMILY WANTS, AT PRICES FAMILIES CAN AFFORD

FRENCH ANTIQUES GO ON SALE THURSDAY

Three-Day Auction to Dispose of Furniture and Art Objects of Retiring Firm.

WALL PAPER IS HISTORIC

Painted Screens of Various Periods, a Louis XVI Bedstead and Directoire Chairs Are Offered.

Thursday, Friday and Saturday French antique furniture and art objects from Old France, Inc., will be auctioned at the American Art Association Anderson Galleries, Inc. The Old France Company is going out of business.

The sale will open with glass, some early American porcelain, Staffordshire, Whieldon and other ware and a miscellaneous lot of small objects. There is a six-fold painted paper screen with costumed figures of the Louis Seize period and prunus trees with plumaged birds perched in their branches, Chinese fashion, on a celadon ground. There is also a Chinese teakwood and painted glass fireside screen, the glass panels of which are painted with high court personages, immortals and symbols of the virtues. Another is a Directoire period screen of painted paper with allegories. A kneeling woman succoring an eagle as the motif is repeated and alternates with Directoire urns and lamberquins painted in grisaille and green and white on pale blue with black and orange borders. Still another decorated paper screen with rose ground of the Louis Quinze period shows peacocks perched on voluted balustrades intermingled with prunus branches. A six-fold painted canvas screen in the Louis Seize taste has views of a château by river and lake, a rural hamlet with figures simulating Aubusson tapestry panels, and beneath, six smaller panels of flower and leaf festoons on a dark ground. Another French decorated paper screen has scènes des Indies with Mohammedan temple and architecture, also traveling troubadours in colorful costumes.

A laqué and carved Louis Seize period bedstead with leaf-carved finals has its upholstered ends covered in Persian design printed fabric. A commode de bois cerisier, Louis Quinze period, is serpentine curved, carved with ogive panels and molded returns extending into cabriole legs. A valanced apron conforms to the contour of the drawer-fronts.

A set of Directoire scenic wall paper, 1815, "Les Monuments de Paris," includes Paris edifices of note. The seven panels are printed by Dufour and were illustrated in Nancy McClelland's "Historic Wall Papers," 1924. A lot of eleven panels of flower-painted canvas wall covering with pale blue ground has bouquets, festoons and baskets of flowers, birds and butterflies in pastel tints.

A carved fruitwood lit de repos, Directoire period, has gracefully gondoled ends with double lyre splats, the crest rails carved in foliage, with curved and tapered supports. There are numerous fruitwood pieces. A set of six Directoire fruitwood chairs have arched, open backs having carved splats composed of plumaged birds perched on branches in oval medallions between fluted columns.

There are many small tables and numerous chairs, some in caned fruitwood, others with petit point and two carved and polychromed in the Georges Jacob manner with medallion-shaped oval backs. The sale will offer also carpets, rugs and decorative paintings.

BLIZZARD AIDS ARREST OF WISCONSIN BANDITS

Robbers Lose Their Way in Snow and Police Get Them, Recovering $2,000 Booty.

SUPERIOR, Wis., Dec. 7 (AP).—A blizzard got principal credit today for prompt solution of the $2,000 robbery of the Wisconsin State Bank at South Superior.

Three men held in jail as the robbers could blame the blinding snow and a feeble knowledge of highways for their arrest. The men were "dumped" into the hands of the police, who said two of them had confessed and all the stolen money had been recovered.

Those held were Edward Kosmic of Joliet, Ill., and Jack Burton and George Hemming of Chicago.

Three men entered the bank yesterday, scooped up money from the cages at the point of pistols and fled through the storm. About six miles south of here, not knowing where they were, they turned east. A police car which had followed them took a different route, turning west. The pursuers met the pursued. The pursued drove into town, circled several blocks and then drove out again only to return.

In the centre of the business section the police did some quick manoeuvring. The bandit car crashed into a light pole. The pole and car were wrecked. Out stepped the bandits, hands in the air, and surrendered.

FIND BOMB IN NEW HOTEL.

Hot Springs (Ark.) Police Search for Guests Who Placed It.

HOT SPRINGS, Ark., Dec. 7 (AP).—A time clock connected with batteries and wires and two small bottles of high-test gasoline were found in the new Pindall Hote' here today and destroyed by police, who immediately began a search for two men who engaged a room at the hotel last night. The apparatus was found by a room clerk.

The guests were quickly notified and left the structure.

MEXICO UNAFRAID OF REVOLT THREAT

President-Elect Ortiz Rubio at Hot Springs, Ark., Scouts Vasconcelos Report.

MORROW REACHES TEXAS

Envoy Declines to Talk on Plans—Embassy Legal Adviser Says Election Was Fairest Yet.

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 7 (AP).—The reported declaration in San Antonio, Texas, in behalf of José Vasconcelos, unsuccessful candidate for the Mexican Presidency, that an armed revolt was being prepared in Mexico, was received with little concern here.

Opinion in both official and private quarters, so far as could be learned, was that the country as a whole was not in sympathy with any attempt to disturb the peace. Agitation has been going on in certain discontented groups, but the general opinion appeared to be that they were a minority and inadequately prepared to create a disturbance of serious proportions.

Rosendo Ibarra, a young student, who was a member of one of these groups, was arrested several days ago near Culiacan on a charge of plotting an uprising in Guadalajara. He is being held in Mazatlan pending disposal of his case by the War Department.

Permits Vasconcelos Statements.

The government is so sure of its position that it has taken no step to interfere with publication here of Vasconcelos's statements. It counts on the allegiance of the army and ability to quickly stamp out any uprising that might appear.

Carlos Castro Balda and a half a dozen of his alleged associates, who were arrested soon after the assassination of General Alvaro Obregon in July, 1928, and who have been held since on a charge of dynamiting the Chamber of Deputies, have been freed of that accusation, but now face the graver charges of rebellion and participation in the responsibility for the assassination.

In waiving the dynamiting charge the prosecutor passed over an accusation to which the principal defendants already had confessed, to bring them to trial on charges which they have steadfastly denied. They are accused of having been accomplices of the assassin, José de Leon Toral.

Morrow Back in Country.

SAN ANTONIO, Texas, Dec. 7 (AP).—Dwight W. Morrow, Ambassador to Mexico, passed through San Antonio in a special car over the Missouri Pacific Lines today en route to his home in Englewood, N. J.

The Ambassador declined to express opinions on the disarmament conference, which he will attend; the rumored Vasconcelos revolt in Mexico, or the New Jersey Senatorship vacancy for which he has been mentioned.

Mr. Morrow was accompanied by Mrs. Morrow, his daughter, Elizabeth; A. Springer, his private secretary, and Mrs. Springer; George Rublee, legal adviser of the Embassy, and Captain Lewis McBride, naval attaché and unofficial financial adviser, and Mrs. McBride.

Regarding a rumored revolt which the defeated Mexican Presidential candidate, José Vasconcelos, is said to be planning, Mr. Rublee said that the recent Mexican election was the fairest ever held there and that not more than 5 per cent of the republic's population was dissatisfied with the results.

Ambassador Morrow said that his family would spend the Christmas holidays in Englewood, N. J., following which he will embark for the disarmament conference in London.

The Ambassador and his party are due to arrive in St. Louis at 11:30 A. M. tomorrow and will leave a half hour later for Cleveland, arriving there at 11:30 P. M. Sunday.

Señor Vasconalos signalized his appearance here yesterday by declaring he fled to America to escape "government assassins," and asserting he would return and capture the Presidential chair by armed force as soon as his followers could be organized.

Señor Ortiz Rubio at Hot Springs, Ark., thanked a newspaper man for calling to his attention Señor Vasconcelos's manifesto, said it was "of no consequence," and advised that it be allowed to occasion no worry.

"The President-elect," said his secretary-spokesman, "knows the source from which it came."

Ortiz Rubio Will Visit Hoover.

HOT SPRINGS, Ark., Dec. 7 (AP).—Pascual Ortiz Rubio, President-elect of Mexico, has signified his intention of accepting the inviation of President Hoover to visit the White House while on his visit to the United States, it was disclosed here this afternoon.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

PLANS FULL EXHIBIT OF RANGER FUND ART

National Academy of Design Collects 78 Paintings for Display Dec. 11-Jan. 31.

ALL BY AMERICAN ARTISTS

Pictures, Distributed Among Museums Throughout Country, Are Assembled for First Time.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—An event of interest in the field of art will be an exhibition of the seventy-eight pictures so far purchased by the National Academy of Design from the Henry Ward Ranger fund, at the National Gallery of Art in Washington from Dec. 11 to Jan. 31. All of the paintings are by outstanding contemporary American artists.

Henry Ward Ranger, himself an artist of note and an academician of the National Academy of Design, died in 1916, leaving his entire estate to the academy, the income to be used to purchase pictures by living American artists, the majority to be by artists over 45 years of age.

These pictures are assigned by the academy to art associations, museums and libraries that are free to the public, the assignment being subject to the privilege of the National Gallery of Art, Smithsonian Institution of claiming any of the pictures which it deems desirable for the national collection within the five-year period beginning ten years after the artist's death.

Regarding the operation of this provision, the catalogue to be issued for the coming exhibition says:

"A large number of museums and art associations are eligible to receive these Ranger fund pictures, and the number is gradually increasing.

"Every effort has been made by the National Academy of Design to extend the educational and cultural influence of these Ranger fund pictures. The works are selected and purchased by the council of the academy, and their choice is carefully made in order that the different examples may represent the best of the different tendencies of contemporary American painting.

"The assemblage in the National Gallery of representative examples of the works of American painters, and of the periods represented, will give to the Ranger bequest great national importance. In the course of time, as the centuries pass, there will have been brought together an assemblage of art works such as no other agency or procedure can hope to surpass."

Through the cooperation of the numerous art galleries and museums to which the pictures have been assigned, and of the National Academy of Design, the Ranger fund paintings now for the first time will be exhibited together. The costs of the assemblage have been defrayed by the Carnegie Corporation of New York.

The seventy-eight pictures listed in the catalogue represent seventy-four artists as follows:

URGES LOWER AGE FOR CIVIL PENSION

Federal Civil Service Commission Also Favors Optional Retirement at Age of 60.

WOMEN IN TECHNICAL JOBS

They Qualify as Architects, Chemists and Entomologists, Annual Report Reveals.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—A lower retirement age for Federal employes, with optional retirement at the age of 60 after long service, is recommended in the annual report of the Civil Service Commission, made public today.

The report also emphasized the importance of character investigations, especially for positions of trust, and again asked that Presidential positions, such as collectors of internal revenue and customs and postmasters that are not policy determining, be classified under the civil service law.

It recommended specifically also restoration to the classified service of the positions of Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue and Deputy Marshal.

Dealing with the question of prohibition examination, which presented a major problem in the previous year because a majority of the agents then in the service failed to meet the civil service tests, the commission said:

"The current requirements of the Bureau of Prohibition for eligibles for administrative positions appear now to have been met through competitive examination.

"The field work incident to the examination for agent, as well as for similar work on examinations for agent and inspector, anti-narcotic act, and storekeeper-gauger, is still in progress. It is anticipated that all of these examinations will be completed and registers of eligibles established within the calendar year 1929."

Women Get Technical Posts.

Under the heading "Promotion of Women," the report stated that during the fiscal year women employes in the various departments qualified through non-competitive examinations for such positions as assistant architect, assistant chemist, assistant entomologist, business specialist, assistant business specialist, claims examiner, junior and assistant home economic specialist, assistant editor, junior assistant and associate attorney, and junior librarian.

Some of these women started their careers in the lower grades of the same work, the report said, but many of them had advanced from clerks and stenographers.

On the subject of character investigation, the report said that experience had demonstrated the definite need for a searching inquiry into the qualifications of persons seeking appointment to positions of responsibility and trust.

"Up to the present time," the report said, "arrangements have been made to take fingerprints of applicants of approximately 1,500 places throughout the country. During the fiscal year 3,296 detections were made of persons with court records who had denied having them."

Veterans Given Preference.

The report said that from the passage of the veteran preference act of July 11, 1919, up to June 30, 1929, a total of 134,813 persons entitled to preference were appointed, and that from the issuance of the executive order of March 3, 1923, up to June 30, 1929, a total of 7,366 disabled veterans were appointed, of whom 1,637 were appointed in the last year.

Dealing with retirement, the report said that the fact that 20.87 per cent of all annuitants now on the roll were retired for total disability before they reached retirement age, indicated that there are many in the service whose efficiency is impaired, but who cannot be retired now, their disability not being total.

"A lowering of the retirement age and an optional retirement," the report added, "say at the age of 60, after long service, would make for greater efficiency."

The report recommended that policemen and firemen in the District of Columbia be placed under the competitive civil service system.

URGES MORE CANCER AID.

Dr. Little Pleads for Public Support to Increase Laboratories.

Laboratory work in cancer research must be undertaken on a far wider scale than has as yet been done if the potential fruits of such work are to be realized, Dr. Clarence Cook Little, managing director of the American Society for the Control of Cancer, declared yesterday at a luncheon of the American Institute at the Astor Hotel.

After describing research which he is carrying on with mice at the Roscoe B. Jackson Memorial Laboratory at Bar Harbor, Me., Dr. Little appealed to his audience to lend their individual support to educate the public to the realization that laboratories all over the country should be supported in such work, as distinguished from the small handful so supported now. He declared that even now the United States leads the world in the science of genetics, boasting a score of individuals any one of whom is equal to Europe's best in the science.

Other speakers at the luncheon were Dr. Albert F. Blakeslee and Dr. Charles W. Metz of the Carnegie Institution. Edwin Forrest Mudrock was the toastmaster.

FINDS CHEMISTRY POPULAR.

Dr. C. J. Moore Says More Women Are Studying Medicine.

More women are entered in the medical profession than ever before, according to Dr. Charles J. Moore, for fifteen years head of the department of chemistry of Hunter College, in accounting for the unusual growth of his department. In 1914 there were but three instructors and 322 students, and now there are fourteen instructors and 612 students.

"The Hunter student is very easy to work with," declared Dr. Moore, who has had twenty years of experience in the University of Georgia, Harvard and New York University, "because she is more conscientious than boys of her age. She has her aims clear in view and knows how she is going to accomplish them, being willing in the meantime to put up with all sorts of inconveniences. Boys, on the other hand, are very likely to be distracted by outside activities, such as football. In general, girls are superior to boys as students."

CARL MILLES FINDS OUR CULTURE HIGH

Swedish Sculptor Is Impressed by Youthful Spirit of American People.

LIKES THEIR HELPFULNESS

He Will Spend Three Months a Year Teaching His Art at Cranbrook Foundation Near Detroit.

"There is more culture in America than people in Europe imagine," Professor Carl Milles of the Royal Swedish Academy of A.. in Stockholm declared in an interview yesterday at the Hotel Commodore. Mr. Milles is in the United States to visit friends, to lecture and to attend the unveiling of several of his works, some of which have been acquired by museums.

"I have met some persons who stand unusually high culturally, higher than most people I ever met in Europe," he said. "The Americans' striking characteristic is their extreme willingness to help. Another American feature is the equality among people, which I find magnificent. I have seen very rich men help their valets to carry out baggage to a waiting car. On the whole all my experiences are only flattering to the Americans."

Mr. Milles said that when he first arrived he found life here overwhelming and almost frightening, but that after a few weeks he had discovered that among the din of machines could be heard a human, friendly voice. He declared he was very much impressed by the youthful spirit of the people.

Professor Milles, who confessed that he had always nourished a secret longing to visit America, likes this country so much that he has accepted the post as a teacher of sculpture at the Cranbrook Foundation near Detroit. He will spend three months every year there, starting next September.

Mr. Milles said that he had the greatest admiration for this institution, the creation of George Booth, journalist and educator. From being a school for boys established on the private ground of Mr. Booth, it is gradually developing into one of the countries greatest universities, he said.

Will Lecture on Aviation Pioneers.

Contrasting the aviation industry of 1912 with that of the present, Elizabeth Hiatt Gregory will deliver an anniversary lecture on "The Pioneers in Aviation" on Thursday morning at 11 o'clock in the Ritz-Carleton Hotel, Lexington Avenue at Forty-sixth Street. Mrs. Gregory is one of the first women in the United States actively connected with aviation and has been a writer and lecturer on the subject for more than fifteen years.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

WISE WILL DELIVER EULOGY OF BLOCH

Funeral of Assembly Leader to Be Held at 2 P. M. Today in Park Av. Synagogue.

Funeral services for Maurice Bloch, Democratic leader of the assembly, will be held at 2 o'clock this afternoon in the Park Avenue Synagogue, 50 East Eighty-seventh Street. The funeral procession will leave the Universal Funeral Chapel, 597 Lexington Avenue, at 1 o'clock and proceed west on Fifty-third Street, north on Park Avenue and east on Eighty-seventh Street to the synagogue.

The eulogy will be delivered by Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, and Rabbi Gabriel Schulman will tell of Mr. Bloch's work in connection with the Park Avenue Synagogue.

The name of Dock Commissioner Michael Cosgrove was omitted from the list of sixteen honorary pallbearers published yesterday.

Until 1 o'clock the body will lie in state at the funeral chapel. Hundreds of friends and admirers of Mr. Bloch, including Lieut. Gov. Herbert H. Lehman and several prominent city officials, viewed the body yesterday.

ALBANY, Dec. 7 (AP).—State Senator John Knight, majority leader of the Senate, today appointed a committee of Senators to represent that body at the funeral tomorrow of Maurice Bloch.

The committee, headed by Senator Knight, includes Bernard Downing, minority leader of the Senate; Samuel Hofstadter, John J. Dunnigan, Thomas F. Burchill, Duncan T. O'Brien, Thomas J. Sheridan, John L. Buckley, A. J. Kennedy and John A. Hastings.

WARM SPRINGS, Ga., Dec. 7 (AP).—Cutting short his scheduled stay here by a few days to attend the funeral of Maurice Bloch in New York, Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt left here today. He is due to arrive in New York tomorrow.

He was in fine physical condition, driving his automobile the forty miles to Newman to board a train. While here the Governor was working on his message to the Legislature and except on a few inclement days has gone into a pool for a daily swim.

PAYS $6,800 FOR WINE JAR.

J. S. Carter Acquires Ming Relic at Auction—Sale Totals $66,597.

The sale of Chinese art belonging to Yamanaka & Co. held at the American Art Association Anderson Galleries, Inc., closed yesterday with a total for the day of $66,597, and a grand total of $136,884.50.

A pair of decorated Ming wine jars with original covers brought the sale's top price, $6,800, going to J. S. Carter.

An imperial Coromandel lacquer 12-fold screen carved in low relief, representing the celebration of the sixth anniversary of the accession of the Emperor K'ang-hsi in the first month of 1667, was sold to W. F. Fanning for $1,700. W. A. Seaman, agent, paid $1,900 for a carved rock crystal pagoda incense burner and cover. A peachbloom writer's coup, the body coated with strawberry pink glaze mottled with kingfisher green was bought by W. Henry for $1,400. An imperial Mongolian gold and silk-woven palace rug went to A. Gillon for $1,300.

dustry was "free of inflation of any kind" or overproduction of any nature.

Alfred W. Donovan of Boston, president of the New England Shoe and Leather Association, reported that shoe and leather merchants "were now looking forward to a resumption of normal conditions."

Thomas S. Branham of New York, president of the National Wholesale Grocers' Association, stated that three-quarters of the jobbers canvassed reported better collections than a year ago, with cancellations normal.

Regarding instalment buying, C. C. Hanch of the National Association of Finance Companies of Chicago reported that there "has been no indication of any adverse effect on business due to the stock market débâcle," and only a normal seasonal reduction in volume, with "no noticeable increase in defaults or delinquencies."

Urges "Business Reserve" Agency.

The creation of an agency which would give to business the same sort of service which the Federal Reserve Board affords banking interests was urged by Lewis E. Pierson, chairman of the Board of the Irving Trust Company of New York City, in an address broadcast from Washington tonight by the National Broadcasting Company.

He maintained that the creation of such an agency would enable business to balance production and consumption and stabilize employment and therefore purchasing power.

Asserting that a new spirit of confidence has followed the efforts of President Hoover and leading business men to assure business in general that conditions are sound, Mr. Pierson went on:

"If we find that the frank exchange of opinion among business leaders during an emergency prevents an impending panic, I am wondering why industry should be deprived of this aid when business is normal. Why should we wait for trouble before we call into play the full capacity of business cooperation? In other words, I am wondering why there should not be performed for general business some of the services that the Federal Reserve Board provides for the banks of the country."

Would Warn of Dangers Ahead.

The panics of 1907 and 1920-21 could have been avoided, he held, if agencies had been in existence which would have warned American business of the specific danger ahead.

Through such an agency the balancing of production and consumption, the "basis of our prosperity," would be possible, giving manufacturers, producers of raw materials, retailers, bankers and transportation lines accurate knowledge of requirements.

Merle Thorpe, editor of The Nation's Business, a Chamber of Commerce publication, described the organization to be set up as the result of the business survey conference as a "business weather bureau."

"By this experiment it is planned to set up human machinery by which we will be able to discover 'low pressure' areas in business before the storm breaks," he said. "Advance information will enable us to fill in the valleys and maintain business on an upward climb by easy grades. In the past, business advancement has been made by surging forward and then falling back; another surge, another recession. The job is to provide a more regular progression and to eliminate drastic recession."

H. R. BREVOORT SUED FOR BROKEN TROTH

Miss Mary Ryther of Sayville Asks $300,000, Charging He Promised to Marry Her.

ACTION AGAINST AUNT ALSO

Mrs. Frances Lefferts Alienated Nephew, Plaintiff Declares—Both Deny Allegations.

Miss Mary Ryther of Sayville, who describes herself as "a poor working girl," 30 years old, has brought suit in the Supreme Court against Henry R. Brevoort, 42 years old, descendant of an old Knickerbocker family, for $300,000 for breach of promise of marriage, and has filed an action against his wealthy and socially prominent aunt, Mrs. Frances C. Lefferts, widow of Robert Lefferts, for alienating his affections. Miss Ryther alleges that Mrs. Lefferts caused the engagement to be broken off in 1928, after she had known Mr. Brevoort for six years, when she learned the plaintiff was of humble origin.

The suits were disclosed yesterday when Supreme Court Justice Wasservogel directed Mr. Brevoort to testify before trial in the suit against himself, and also ordered Miss Katherine A. Kenney, a nurse formerly employed in the Lefferts household, to testify concerning the friendship of Miss Ryther and Mr. Brevoort. The court denied a request for the examination of Mr. Brevoort before trial in the suit against his aunt on the ground that the nature of the action is such that the examination should not be permitted.

Miss Ryther, who says the defendant promised to marry her in June, 1923, and has since refused to keep his agreement, asserted in her papers that Mrs. Lefferts caused her nephew to break the engagement because the marriage of Mr. Brevoort, "who is socially prominent and of aristocratic family, and financially responsible to the plaintiff, was felt not to be desirable for the defendant and his relatives." She asserted that Mr. Brevoort knew her station in life because for years he visited her "humble home" at Sayville and "dined there year in and year out with her mother, brothers and sisters."

In her application to examine Mr. Brevoort the plaintiff wanted to ask him about his social standing and financial condition, and also whether he told his aunt he was keeping company with her and whether she objected to the marriage, but the court allowed only questions as to his wealth and social position. Miss Ryther asked to examine Miss Kenney, who is temporarily in New York, as to whether Mrs. Lefferts directed her "to devise ways and means to break the relationship and engagement existing between the plaintiff and defendant, which she alleges Miss Kenney did.

Justice Wasservogel refused to permit these questions, but directed Miss Kenney to testify as to an auto trip she took with Miss Ryther and Mr. Brevoort in New England and whether the couple showed affection for each other.

Mrs. Lefferts and Mr. Brevoort have filed answers denying the allegations against them.

Mr. Brevoort is related to Henry Brevoort, whose farm originally included the site of Grace Church. Robert Lefferts, his uncle, who died at the Vanderbilt Hotel on Dec. 29, 1926, was a member of the Lefferts family of Flatbush, and a vice president of the Holland Society.

Miss Ryther lives with the other members of her large family in a modest house in Sayville. Her mother is Mrs. Jessie Ryther and she has three sisters and four brothers. Her father died several years ago. He was of Bohemian extraction and was reputed to have made considerable money in Seattle in the early days of the Klondike gold rush. Miss Ryther is employed by an insurance company in Manhattan.

Paints Delius Hearing Own Work.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 7.—A picture of Frederick Delius, blind composer, listening to his "Mass of Life" during the recent Delius festival here, is the chief attraction at the exhibition of the work of Ernest Procter. The canvas shows Delius sitting in an invalid's chair with the vast Queen's Hall audience in the background.

ADOPT A PROGRAM FOR 'EQUAL RIGHTS'

Woman's Party Delegates in Washington Approve Pan-American Treaty.

WORLD AFFILIATION VOTED

Convention Agrees to Join the Open Door International in Work for Industrial Equality.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—The "equal rights" treaty presented to the Pan-American Congress in Havana in 1928 was unanimously endorsed tonight by the National Woman's Party at its convention here.

The delegates also endorsed the treaty agreement in regard to the independent nationality of women, proposed for submission to the conference on the codification of international law, to be held next March at The Hague.

With equal unanimity it was voted to affiliate with the Open Door International, created abroad by women who are working in thirty countries for industrial equality for all workers, regardless of sex, and in opposition to special legislation for women in industry.

Mrs. Elizabeth Selden Rogers of New York presented the proposed draft convention on nationality. It reads, in part:

"The high contracting parties agree that from the going into effect of this treaty there shall be no distinction based on sex in their law and practice relating to nationality."

This proposed agreement, which was drafted by Miss Alice Paul, chairman of the nationality committee of the Inter-American Commission of Women, was endorsed in Havana last month by the governing board of the American Institute of International Law.

Welcomes Women as Diplomats.

Participation of women with men in international affairs was welcomed by Ambassador Ferrara of Cuba, honor guest and principal speaker at the dinner tonight.

Women now were penetrating into "the high assemblies of jurists and diplomats," the Ambassador said, but they would find their task there no easy mission.

He urged them to "eschew the abstractions that were useful in a past of struggle, but less to be relied on in the present constructive period," and to "concentrate all the force of their fine intelligence in achieving practical and real results."

Senator Capper, Dr. James Brown Scott, Miss Doris Stevens, Drew Pearson, Mrs. Bertha Moller of Chicago, Miss Gail Laughlin of Portland, Me.; Mrs. Olive Stott Gabriel of New York and Miss Fanny Bunand-Sevastes were among the other speakers.

Mrs. Inez Haynes Irwin presided.

Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont was re-elected president and Mrs. Harvey Wiley of Washington was elected chairman of the national council of the party, succeeding Mrs. Clarence N. Smith of New York, who had asked, because of illness, that she be not renominated.

Other Officers Elected.

Other officers chosen were Mrs. Florence Bayard Hilles of Delaware, Miss Gail Laughlin of Maine and Miss Anita Pollitzer of South Carolina, vice chairmen; Miss Marguerite Smith, secretary, and Miss Emma Wold, treasurer.

The following were elected to the national council of the party for the next two years:

Miss Edith Ainge, Mrs. John Winters Brannan, Mrs. Inez Haynes Irwin, Miss Marion May, Mrs. Ruth Vandeer Litt, Mrs. Stephen Pell, Mrs. Elizabeth Rogers and Mrs. Jane Norman Smith of New York.

Miss Anne Archbold, Mrs. Florence Brewer Boeckel and Mrs. Richard Wainwright, District of Columbia.

Miss Laura Berrien, Georgia.

Mrs. Elizabeth W. Dixon, Mrs. Edith Houghton Hooker and Mrs. Dora G. Ogle, Maryland.

Mrs. Bertha W. Fowler, Colorado.

Mrs. Elizabeth Kent and Miss Maud Younger, California.

Miss Alma Lutz, Massachusetts.

Miss Elsie Hill, Connecticut.

Miss Doris Stevens, Nebraska.

Miss Mabel Vernon, Delaware.

Miss Margaret Whittemore, Michigan.

Mrs. Valentine Winters, Ohio.

Discussion of the proposed international program occupied both business sessions today.

A memorial service for Mrs. Pankhurst will be held tomorrow afternoon in the Capitol, and an equal-rights deputation, headed by Mrs. Stephen Pell of New York, will call on President Hoover at noon on Monday.

SWINNERTON DENIES WARD DROPPED HIM

Lawyer Says He Was Never Officially Appointed to Aid in Westchester Case.

Special to The New York Times.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., Dec. 7.—Radcliffe Swinnerton of New York, who was assistant to Samuel Untermyer in his investigation into Westchester County land transactions during the past Summer, issued a statement today in which he explained his position with regard to the report that he had been dropped by Attorney General Ward as a special assistant in presenting evidence in the inquiry to an extraordinary grand jury here.

When the report was first circulated that Mr. Swinnerton had been dropped, Henry A. Wise of New York, one of the Attorney General's special prosecutors in the case, stated that there was no truth in the report because Mr. Swinnerton had never been appointed to act in the second investigation. Mr. Swinnerton's statement is in agreement with that of Mr. Wise.

"There seems to be some confusion about my participation in the investigation," said Mr. Swinnerton, in part. "To give more attention to some important private matters, I withdrew from the unofficial inquiry (that of Mr. Untermyer) on Sept. 25. On Nov. 11 the Attorney General wrote thanking me for my help in the case.

"As Mr. Wise has said, I was never connected with the official inquiry in the sense that I had no official appointment and in the sense that what I did was merely incidental to the more important work of himself and Messrs. Syme and Penney."

EJECTED WIFE AT NIGHT FROM FIFTH AV. HOME

Robert Everard Gets Suspended Sentence on Condition That He Quit Apartment.

How Robert Everard, 31 years old, ejected his wife, Ruth, from their apartment at 1,200 Fifth Avenue early yesterday morning, despite the fact that she was dressed only in night attire, was described in Harlem Court when Everard was arraigned on a disorderly conduct charge she preferred. Magistrate Weil found Everard guilty and suspended sentence on condition he would remove his belongings from the apartment and leave his wife alone.

Mrs. Everard, who is said to be a daughter of Robert Wynne, Postmaster General in the Roosevelt Cabinet and former president of the Gridiron Club in Washington, said her husband became abusive Friday night while intoxicated and finally put her out and went to bed. She said she called Patrolman Conley, who was obliged to use a pass key to enter the apartment.

Everard denied he had been abusive and asserted that all he did was to defend himself from his wife when she attempted to strike him.

RICHARD RODGERS TO WED.

Musical Comedy Composer to Marry Dorothy Feiner, Sculptor.

The engagement of Dorothy Feiner, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Feiner, 270 Park Avenue, to Richard Rodgers, musical comedy composer, was announced yesterday. The date for the wedding has not yet been set.

Miss Feiner, a sculptor, was graduated from Wellesley College last June. Mr. Rodgers, whose work has largely been in collaboration with Lorenz Hart, lyricist, first gained attention with the songs written for the first and second editions of the "Garrick Gaieties." Other productions whose scores he has written have been "Dearest Enemy," "Peggy Ann," "A Connecticut Yankee," "Present Arms," "Spring Is Here" and the current "Heads Up!" He is now engaged in writing the score of the next Ziegfeld musical comedy, "Simple Simon." Mr. Rodgers is a graduate of Columbia University.

VOTE UNION DRIVE IN FIFTH AV. SHOPS

Garment Workers Allege Unfair Wages in Fashionable, Custom-Made Establishments.

TO AID TEXTILE CAMPAIGN

Cleveland Convention Votes to Create Separate Joint Dress Board for New York Market.

From a Staff Correspondent of The New York Times.

CLEVELAND, Dec. 7.—An aggressive unionization campaign among custom dressmakers employed in the fashionable shops of New York City was voted today by the convention of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union.

Alleging that 5,000 girls and women were compelled to work in the high-priced shops of the Fifth Avenue district under unfair wage and other conditions, the resolution adopted called for the assignment of three members of the general executive board to cooperate with Local 38 in the unionization drive.

The convention created a separate joint dress board for the New York market. At present all dress and cloak locals are represented by one city central body.

Resolutions were adopted pledging support for the campaign of the American Federation of Labor and the United Textile Workers of America for the unionization of 300,000 textile workers in the South. The international undertook to pay the expenses of one organizer.

Another resolution called for the introduction of the week-work system in all markets where piece work is still the rule. It was also voted to require the union label in the entire women's raincoat industry.

'JERSEY KID' TO FACE TRIAL AS SLAYER JAN. 13

Gangster Captured Here Will Be Arraigned in Newark Tomorrow for Murder of Cashier.

Simon L. Fish, Assistant Prosecutor of Essex County, announced yesterday that Frank McBrien, 28, alias John Murray (the "Jersey Kid"), who was extradited to Newark from New York Friday, would be arraigned tomorrow morning before Judge Flannagan on an indictment charging him with the murder of George B. Lee, public service garage cashier, in a hold-up in October, 1928. McBrien will then be lodged in the Essex County jail and will stand trial on the murder charge on Jan. 13 along with the three other men charged with the Lee murder. These are Victor Giampietro, Louis Malanga and Joseph Rado, whose first trial in November ended in a mistrial because of the illness of a juror.

Detective Powell of Philadelphia brought to the Newark police headquarters Mabel Davis, the girl in whose company McBrien was arrested, in an attempt to draw from the gangster information as to where he hid the $100,000 loot he is said to have obtained in a pawnshop hold-up in Philadelphia. The result of the interview was not made known, but the girl was locked up as a material witness.

General Bullard Improving.

There is no cause for anxiety over the condition of Major Gen. Robert Lee Bullard, his wife said yesterday in their apartment at the Hotel Adams, 2 East Eighty-sixth Street, where the General has been resting since a slight weakness of the heart that occurred on Friday. The General is steadily improving, she said, and, in his own words, all he needs is a few days of rest.

Mrs. Willebrandt to Speak.

ORANGE, N. J., Dec. 7.—Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt, former Assistant United States Attorney General in charge of prohibition enforcement, will speak at the Forefather's day dinner of the New England Society of Orange on Dec. 21, it was announced today. The dinner will mark the fifty-ninth annual meeting of the society and will be held in the Hotel Suburban, East Orange.

FORMER SIDI WIRT WEDS FOURTH TIME

Ex-Wife of J. D. Spreckels Jr. and Turkish Prince Marries Lieut. R. A. Gardner of Army Air Corps.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP).—Sidi Wirt Spreckels, former wife of Prince Suad Chakir of Turkey, was married today to Lieutenant Roger Alan Gardner of the Army Air Corps at Fairfax County Courthouse, Va.

The couple obtained the license at the court house and immediately were married by Deputy Clerk Elton R. Holbrooke of the Circuit Court. Gardner gave his age as 27 and Mrs. Gardner 35. She gave Reno, Nev., as her home.

Lieutenant Gardner, who was formerly stationed at Crissy Field and met Mrs. Spreckels there, is now attached to Langley Field, Va., and officers there today said he was a "short leave."

Today's marriage was Sidi Wirt's fourth. Her first, to Harry Williams, an advertising man, ended in divorce. Later she was married to John D. Spreckels Jr., San Francisco's millionaire, who was killed in an automobile accident. In 1923 she was married to Prince Suad, whom she met on a visit to the Near East. This marriage also ended in divorce.

N. Y. U. WINS DEBATE.

Beats Lafayette at Convention of League at Rutgers.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Dec. 7.—New York University won a victory over Lafayette by an audience decision in the debate which featured the seventeenth annual Rutgers Interscholastic Debating League convention here today. The two teams contested the question, "Resolved, that nations should adopt a policy of complete disarmament except such forces as are needed for police purposes."

The N. Y. U. representatives who upheld the negative of the question are Norman Adler, Milton Rosenberg and Paul Rogosin, all seniors. Lafayette's team, upholding the affirmative, consisted of Stanley I. Cundey, Robert B. Maeyner and Walter S. Anderson, also seniors.

VARE TO RUN AGAIN FOR SENATE, HE SAYS

the Vare announcement would influence the Governor to delay the appointment for several days. He declined to comment on Mr. Vare's statement this afternoon in Harrisburg.

Some politicians believed the Vare announcement might be interpreted as an invitation to the Governor to appoint Mr. Vare to the Senate, and this brought up speculation on the probable attitude of the Senate in such an event. Governor Fisher had been quoted previously, however, as saying he would not name Mr. Vare.

The Philadelphia organization leader reached his decision suddenly on the matter of seeking vindication at the May primaries. At Washington, before his train started, he had no comment to offer. By the time he reached Baltimore he had perused a large number of papers from New York, Philadelphia and elsewhere, paying particular attention to the editorial pages.

A few minutes later one of the accompanying newspaper correspondents was called to his side.

"I have been thinking it over," said Mr. Vare, slowly, "and I am a candidate—a candidate to the finish."

Then he dictated his formal statement.

"Are you going to discuss the announcement with any party leaders when you reach Philadelphia?" he was asked.

"I have no engagements," he replied.

"How about the appointment? Will you see the Governor on that?"

"I just said I have no engagements," he persisted. "There will be nothing further said beyond the statement I have just dictated."

"Does this mean that you will be a candidate at the May primaries?"

"Why, it can't mean anything else," he responded, as he retired to a drawing room for a rest.

Vare in Good Spirits.

With Mr. Vare were his wife and two daughters, Miss Beatrice Vare and Mrs. W. F. Kipp, as well as Dr. John J. Shaw, Mr. Kipp and Judge Leopold C. Glass of the Philadelphia Municipal Court. John O'Donnell, chairman of the Democratic City Committee, and several others boarded the train at Wilmington.

By the time the train pulled into Philadelphia Mr. Vare had become vigorous in his actions, emphatic in his manner, and the whole party was in good spirits.

Policemen who boarded the train at West Philadelphia kept back the crowd as the party alighted at Broad Street.

A shout went up from the first group that reached Mr. Vare as he was aided down the car steps. A delegation of Republican ward chieftains hurried up, led by James M. Hazell, chairman of the Republican City Committee, who said of the Vare statement:

"The people are with him. It was the only thing for him to do."

Limping perceptibly and with Mrs. Vare at his side, Mr. Vare passed slowly through the narrow lane, as the crowd gave three cheers and a band played.

Ralph Beaver Strassburger of Norristown and several others elbowed their way through the crowd to shake hands, and several women active in Republican politics approached the rejected Senator-elect, some with tears in their eyes, and greeted him eagerly.

Spurning the use of an automobile, Mr. Vare limped across the street in the direction of City Hall, while traffic came to a standstill to let him pass. With a detail of police preceding him, he began a march of triumph that took him through a lane of men and women to his office in the Land Title Building. Mr. Vare had lunch with his wife in his office, and during a brief interval of rest he met several friends. Later he and his family motored to their Atlantic City home.

Local political observers saw in the Vare declaration more significance than the mere fact that he would try again to fulfill his ambition to sit in the Senate. It was generally admitted that the announcement eliminated the possibility of the Philadelphia leader putting forward a candidate for Governor next year.

There are the offices of lieutenant governor, secretary of internal affairs, justice of the Supreme Court, and judge of the superior court also to be taken into consideration when party leaders settle down to the task of agreeing upon a state-wide ticket. Francis Shunk Brown, chief of Mr. Vare's counsel, has for some time been mentioned as a Gubernatorial candidate.

There remains the problem which will be created in Pennsylvania Republican politics if Governor Fisher disregards the Vare statement altogether and appoints to the Senatorship somebody, other than Mr. Vare, who will insist upon seeking the nomination in May. It had been generally believed that Mr. Grundy or any other appointee would become the Republican candidate to succeed himself.

Major Contest Is Expected.

HARRISBURG, Pa., Dec. 7 (AP).—A contest of major proportions, approaching or exceeding the famous 1926 primary, appeared in the political offing tonight over the selection of a junior Senator from Pennsylvania to take the seat in the Senate denied William S. Vare.

Governor Fisher, who has power of appointment of a successor to Mr. Vare, declined to comment on the statement issued by the Philadelphia Republican leader upon his return to his native city that he was "a candidate to the finish" for the Senatorship.

It was hailed at the capital, nevertheless, as the cry for battle, resuming the fight of the 1926 campaign, in which the Republican ticket headed by Mr. Fisher battled Mr. Vare and his running mates.

The Governor is known to be favorable to the appointment of Joseph R. Grundy, president of the Pennsylvania Manufacturers' Association, who was one of the chief supporters of the Fisher ticket three years ago.

The Vare statement today was the first definite intimation the Governor had that the Philadelphian wanted the place since rejection. Meanwhile the Governor's office has been receiving telegrams by the score asking that it be offered to Mr. Grundy.

Neither Mr. Grundy nor any one else has thus far received a proffer of the appointment, the Governor made known. Before the issuance of the Vare statement the Executive told newspaper men he had no conferences on the selection listed for the week-end. As soon as the statement appeared in newspapers, however, the Governor called in several of his friends and advisers at the Capitol.

Grundy Sounding Out Senators.

As late as this afternoon Mr. Grundy was in Washington. Whether, in view of the Vare statement, the Governor would call a meeting of Mr. Grundy and other leaders of the State Republican organization, including W. L. Mellon, former State chairman and nephew of the Secretary of the Treasury, was undetermined. Mr. Grundy has been in Washington for several days, ostensibly to sound out sentiment among the members of the Senate from the States he previously dubbed as "backward" and others as to his chances for being seated if named by the Governor.

It is believed Mr. Fisher by Monday will make a formal offer of the Senatorial appointment to Mr. Grundy, with an urgent request that he accept it. Mr. Grundy's strength in the party in Pennsylvania is looked to as the only means of getting Mr. Vare to step aside and prevent a rift at the primaries next May, when nominations will be made for Governor as well as Senator to fill the remainder of the unexpired Vare term after the first Monday in January, 1931, the expiration date of the appointive term.

If Mr. Grundy declines the post because of fear of opposition to his seating or other reasons, or if Mr. Vare refuses to step aside regardless of the entrance of Grundy in the race, political observers here were certain of a heated fight between the two factions in May. In addition, it is felt here that former Governor Gifford Pinchot, who was one of the two men defeated by Mr. Vare in 1926, would enter the campaign for Senator in the event of a split in the organization.

Urges Fisher to Name a Wet.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 7 (AP).—Robert K. Cassatt, chairman of the Pennsylvania division of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, today made public a letter to Governor Fisher asking the Pennsylvania executive, in selecting a successor to William S. Vare for the Senate, to appoint a "Republican who will use his vote and influence to secure legislation which will restore to our State power of control over the liquor traffic of which it has been deprived by the national prohibition law."

LIVINGSTON SEES HOOVER AGAINST HIM

Convinced of Opposition of the President, but Kings Chief Declares He Won't Quit.

RELEASES ALL HIS BACKERS

He Frees Officeholders From Any Obligation to Him in Show-Down —Mrs. Gooderson Backs Him.

In a statement yesterday, Jacob A. Livingston, Republican leader in Kings County, said that developments in Washington had convinced him that President Hoover desired his removal from leadership. Nevertheless, Mr. Livingston said, he had no intention of resigning.

The purpose of the statement was to place on record his release from all obligation to him Federal officeholders on the County Executive Committee or other members with relatives on the Federal payroll whose jobs might be jeopardized were they to take their stand with him at the "showdown" before the committee, which probably will come this week.

The statement was dictated by Mr. Livingston when he reached his desk at the office of the Election Board in the Municipal Building yesterday morning.

The statement follows:

I am now convinced by what took place in Washington yesterday that the President of the United States is much interested in the Republican politics of this county and that he desires a change in the leadership here.

I have consulted sin[illegible] hat happening with a great number of my friends. It is their opinion that I should advise those who are in the Federal service and those who have relatives there also, and who have membership in the Republican Executive Committee of this county, to subscribe to the new order of things so that their retention in public office shall not be imperiled.

JACOB A. LIVINGSTON.

Expect Reaction From Statement.

The development in Washington to which Mr. Livingston had reference was the appointment by President Hoover of Major Walter E. Corwin, foe of Livingston and leader of the Seventeenth Assembly District in Kings, to succeed Warren G. Price, Collector of Internal Revenue for the First New York District, who is a supporter of Mr. Livingston.

Some friends of Mr. Livingston expressed the belief yesterday that his statement would make it necessary for the President to repudiate the blunt suggestion if carried out that he was meddling in local politics and using Federal patronage to oust leaders to whom he was opposed. A word from the President along those lines, they i..sisted, would bring about the complete collapse of the anti-Livingston movement.

On the other hand, it was the prevailing opinion that the statement of the Kings County leader reflected frank recognition on his part of the probability that the executive committee would deprive him of power and transfer to Meier Steinbrink the work of dispensing Federal patronage.

A survey of the roster of Republican district leaders in Kings indicates that seven votes on the executive committee might be affected by the release. Included in the list of committee members whom Federal patronage normally might influence in favor of Mr. Livingston's opponent are Harry D. Ralston, leader of the First, who is secretary to the Collector of the Port; Mrs. Lulu Simonson, coleader of the Third; Mrs. Catherine G. Cannon, co-leader of the Seventh, and Mrs. Loretta Danemeyer, coleader of the Eighth; Frank J. Fanning, leader of the Ninth, who is Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue, and Jesse D. Moore and Mrs. Mabel Applebee, the former leader of the Thirteenth Assembly District and United States Marshall, the latter coleader and employed in the Internal Revenue Bureau.

Mrs. Gooderson Backs Him.

While it was generally admitted that the outlook for the veteran leader was dark, there was one bright spot. Mrs. May M. Gooderson, co-leader in the Eleventh Assembly District and one of the most influential women in Republican politics in Kings, yesterday took her stand boldly with Mr. Livingston. It had been said by the opposition that Mrs. Gooderson would join the anti-Livingston group after a visit to Mr. Steinbrink early last week. She explained yesterday that she had called by invitation and had been asked but refused to sign a petition to call the executive committee meeting at which it is planned by the opponents to vote Livingston out.

Some of Mr. Livingston's friends who gathered at the clubhouse of his home district on Friday night and by unanimous vote adopted resolutions of loyalty to the leader, attacked Transit Commissioner Charles C. Lockwood, chairman of the Kings County Republican Committee, and one of the leaders in the anti-Livingston insurgent movement, as an "Al Smith Republican." He was appointed transit commissioner by Mr. Smith.

James Gruener, who was a candidate for Alderman, said in a speech that at the next meeting of the Republican County Committee he would demand Commissioner Lockwood's removal as county chairman.

Louis Silk, twice a candidate for Assemblyman from the Eleventh Assembly District in Brooklyn and president of the Young People's Republican Organization of Kings County, with headquarters at 317 Washington Street, sent a letter yesterday to Mr. Steinbrink assuring him of support.

DETECTIVES TO CALL BANTON IN DEFENSE

Cordes and Flood to Summon Prosecutor and Coughlin at Departmental Trial.

HEARING OPENS TOMORROW

McManus's Attorney Will Aid Men Accused of Laxity in the Rothstein Case.

District Attorney Banton and John D. Coughlin, former inspector at the head of the detective division, are expected to be called as witnesses tomorrow at the trial of Detective Sergeant John Cordes and Detective Patrick Flood in Police Headquarters on charges that they were lax in their investigation of the murder of Arnold Rothstein, the gambler.

Commissioner Whalen a year ago ordered charges prepared against Cordes and Flood and Detective John Green, who died two days ago, but it was not until yesterday that the formal charges were served on Cordes and Flood in the office of Chief Inspector John O'Brien. Both detectives will be defended by James D. C. Murray, counsel for George A. McManus in the recent General Sessions trial, in which McManus, a former race-track bookmaker, was acquitted of the k[illegible]ng of Rothstein.

The detectives are accused of having neglected to report in writing to their superiors in accordance with police rules just what moves they made to solve the murder and arrest the murderers.

Cordes, in the eight years he has been a detective, twice received the department medal of honor for bravery in arresting criminals who tried to kill him, and on three other occasions received honorable mention.

He is accused of having failed to make any written report on his activities in the Rothstein investigation from the date of the fatal shooting of the gambler, Nov. 4, 1928, until twenty-three days later, when, it is charged, a written report by him was erroneous and defective and failed to account for any time and activity on his part in the case.

Cordes also is accused of having failed to inform his superiors of all of the information he had obtained in the Rothstein case. It is charged that Cordes "failed and neglected to take all the necessary police action in the investigation of the case."

Cordes is charged with having violated the rules of the department when, after his arrest of McManus in a Washington Heights barber shop on Nov. 27, 1928, he took his prisoner directly to the office of District Attorney Banton instead of taking him to the nearest police station for fingerprinting in compliance with the rules. Another clause in the charges accuses Cordes of having violated the rules again in not taking McManus to Police Headquarters to have finger impressions and photographs taken, inasmuch as McManus was accused of a felony and prisoners under such charges must be fingerprinted and photographed at headquarters under the Baumes law.

Cordes's defense will be that he had no option in taking his prisoner to the prosecutor's office. He will call Mr. Banton and Mr. Coughlin to prove that the late Joseph A. Warren, Police Commissioner at the time of the Rothstein killing, ordered him to take McManus direct to the District Attorney's office after Mr. Banton and Mr. Murray, McManus's lawyer, had made an agreement the night before that McManus would surrender only if he would not be taken to Police Headquarters for questioning, but would be taken direct to the District Attorney's office. When Cordes got his prisoner there McManus refused to make any statement, and none ever was received from him after his arrest.

Detective Flood is accused of having dealt the police investigation of the Rothstein murder a serious blow through his neglect to take finger impressions of Rothstein after the gambler's death in the Polyclinic Hospital.

Flood, according to the charges, was negligent in failing to detain important witnesses he had encountered at the hotel soon after the shooting, and he failed even to get their names and addresses or to interrogate them.

The charges also accuse Flood of having failed to inform his superior officers under the rules concerning certain developments in his investigation of the murder, about which he testified at the McManus trial.

Alaska Mountain Belches Smoke.

SEWARD, Alaska, Dec. 7 (AP).—Passengers arriving here on the steamer Starr from West Alaska reported great clouds of white smoke belching from Mount Magiek, one of the Katmai group in the valley of Ten Thousand Smokes. They said the smoke was plainly visible twenty miles at sea. The mountain is in an uninhabited region.

SZECHENYI TO OFFER GIFTS.

Will Present Chalice From Hungary at St. John's Today.

Presentation of a gold chalice and paten, the gifts of the government of Hungary to the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, will be made this afternoon at 4 o'clock at a special service in the cathedral by Count Laszlo Széchényi, Hungarian Minister to the United States. Bishop William T. Manning will formally accept the gifts on behalf of the cathedral.

Representatives of various Hungarian societies will attend the service, as will a detachment of the Old Guard of New York, which will act as a Guard of Honor. Special music will be furnished by the Police Band. Count Laszlo will be accompanied by George de Ghika, Hungarian Consul General in New York City, and General Charles H. Sherrill.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SHANGHAI, Dec. 7.—The deeper implications of the revolt of Anhwei troops under General Shih Yu-san at Pukow are being revealed as the revolters and government troops take up their positions south of Pengpu, straddling the Tientsin-Pukow Railway.

Although there are no hostilities as yet, it is significant that the government troops have adopted a defensive policy, denuding Nanking of soldiers in order to check the immediate threat to the city.

The belief that this is part of a large-scale movement by opposition forces which is crystallizing against Nanking finds emphasis in a circular telegram signed by two-score Kuominchun and government generals, headed by General Tang Seng-chih, urging unity of forces against Russia, but the sting is found in an attached manifesto signed by General Tang attacking President Chiang Kai-shek, urging the return of Wang Ching-wei, Leftist leader, now in Hongkong, and also asking the support of General Chang Fak-wei, whose "Ironsides" are at present attacking Canton.

General Tang Seng-chih was the principal instrument in Nanking's military drive against Marshal Feng Yu-hsiang and the Kuominchun rebels in Honan recently, but the nature of the settlement showed that at best it was merely temporary, in order to afford Nanking a breathing space. Reliable Hankow reports indicate that the situation is not entirely liquidated and evidence of a big anti-Nanking combination is assuming shape.

Nanking troops hurriedly embarked upon the steamers down the river on Friday night, and Hankow reports give expression to the belief that General Tang Seng-chih will take control of the Wuhan area within a week, manifesting his attitude by arresting the government officials at Chengchow.

The next few days are expected to amplify the course of these developments, which overtake Nanking at a particularly weak moment. Friday night Nanking police raided General Tang Seng-chih's local headquarters to seek incriminating evidence, but discovered that all his documents had been destroyed and the staff had fled.

Government Staggers.

SHANGHAI, Dec. 7 (AP.).—China's Nationalist Government staggered tonight as the armed revolt against its authority became widespread.

President Chiang Kai-shek, the generalissimo who three years ago led the Cantonese northward in a great march that subjugated all elements into a unified government, was the special object of attack. An unverified dispatch from Paris asserted that he had resigned and been replaced provisionally by Tang Yen-kai, head of the government's executive council, and that Yen Hsi-shan, Governor of Shansi Province, had become generalissimo.

Shanghai, Nanking, Canton and Hankow were placed under martial law by the harassed government as they were depleted of troops to engage the rebellious forces threatening them.

The British cruiser Suffolk was ordered from Shanghai to Nanking, where it was said, it would take aboard British women and children because of a critical situation in the capital city due to the asserted mutiny of three government regiments.

The railroads leading westerly from Shanghai to Nanking and southerly from Shanghai to Hankow were cut by rebel troops as the demoralization progressed. Reports, hampered by severed wires and government censorship, filtered in, giving accounts of increasingly large defections of government troops as the magnitude of the rebellion grew.

70,000 Soldiers to Fight.

Against the Pukow mutineers who had moved northward from that city to form a mobilization base of other rebels, the government was said to be planning to send 70,000 soldiers. To do this, other areas had been drawn upon and in these weakened areas revolt sprang up.

General Tang Seng-chi, leader of the government forces against the Kuominchun (people's army) troops recently active in Honan and Hupeh Provinces, was ordered dismissed and arrested for circulating a telegram criticizing government policies and expressing sympathy with rebels. The order of arrest was said to have turned 10,000 more soldiers against the government in Honan Province.

Nationalist troops were defeated at Changchow, 100 miles from Shanghai, when they attempted to disarm the Fourth Division, whose loyalty was doubted. The Fourth Division, turned rebel, killed many Nationalists and tore up the railroad tracks between Shanghai and Nanking.

Southern Rebels Rejoice.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

HONGKONG, Dec. 7.—The rebel plotters here are jubilant over the defection of Generals Tang Sheng-chih and Han Fu-chen, whose loyalty to Nanking determined the government victory in November in the Honan uprising.

Coupled with the news of the other desertions from Nanking's cause in the north, the re-emergence of Marshal Wu Pei-fu from Szechuan, the reported defeats of President Chiang Kai-shek in several sectors of the Yangtse areas, while the revolutionists here are claiming a twenty-mile advance toward Canton, the situation is serious indeed for Nanking.

REBEL FORCES NEAR CANTON.

Firing Is Audible, With Confidence in Nanking Strength Shaken.

By HALLETT ABEND.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CANTON, Dec. 7.—Canton's situation has assumed new gravity, its Kwangsi assailants, having found the Samshui defenses impregnable, making a surprise sweep around it via the Bamboo River and they are now only twenty-five miles northwest of the city.

Meanwhile, the rebellious "Ironsides" continue to press upon Kwantin, twenty miles away. The firing is audible in Canton and the wounded are streaming back from the front. Kwantin is well fortified and is likely to be the scene of the main stard of the Cantonese forces. If it is surrendered it will probably seal the fate of the city and make untenable the upriver position of the government forces and gunboats in the Samshui region.

Hundreds of bodies of Kwangsi soldiers are floating downstream, the peasants grewsomely fishing them out because the garrison commander has offered $10 for every rifle or revolver recovered. Some peasants are making hundreds of dollars daily.

An open effort to bribe the "Ironsides" is being made. Nanking airplanes scattering 60,000 leaflets in their camps, offering on behalf of President Chiang Kai-shek $25,000 for General Chang Fa-kwei, dead or alive, and promotion of one grade for all officers deserting, a full month's pay for all privates and an extra $10 for those deserting with rifles or revolvers, and $500 to the crew of every field gun.

Although three more transports of Nanking troops arrived today, making a total this week of 40,000, and although the defenders greatly outnumber their combined assailants, confidence generally has been shaken by news from the north detailing the insistence of many leaders that President Kai-shek resign and the rumors that Nanking is likely soon to be abandoned, which adds to the probability of wholesale desertions from the government forces here.

Friction developed today between General Ho Ying-ching, whom Nanking appointed as Commander-in-Chief of the Canton area, and the local Canton commanders, resulting in General Ho removing his headquarters to the cement works on the Honan side of the river, known historically as Sun Yat-sen's headquarters.

The city is agitated lest the Cantonese and General Ho Ying-ching come to an open clash or the local commanders open the way into the city for the invaders by leaving the Nanking forces on the Honan side of the river badly pocketed.

A great exodus of wealthy Cantonese into Hongkong with quantities of money and treasures is going on.

195 Americans in Canton.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Protection of American interests at Canton, China, where civil war is now endangering the city, is entrusted to the Asiatic fleet, and no special reports from that force were received here today.

Americans in the city of Canton, according to reports as of last July, the latest available, number 195, and in Kwangtung Province, outside the city, number 325. Two-thirds of those in the city are engaged in missionary or educational activities and practically all those outside the city are missionaries.

The principal American property interests in Canton city are the American Consulate and the plant of the Standard Oil Company.

While the American interests in that region are considerable, compared to other sections of China, they are not as large as at either Shanghai or Tientsin.

PRIEST SAYS CAPTORS IN CHINA WERE REDS

Father Kreutzen, Back at Mission After Being Kidnapped, Tells of Educated Bandits.

HANKOW, Dec. 7 (AP.).—The Rev. Ulrich Kreutzen of Calumet, Mich., arrived here today from Tayeh, Hupeh Province, apparently none the worse for three weeks spent as the prisoner of bandits, who had held him for ransom.

Father Kreutzen, freed on payment of $500 gold after the bandits had demanded from $5,000 to $10,000 on pain of torture and death, said his captors were members of a powerful Communist organization. The bandit-Communists, he said, had connections throughout the Yangtze Valley, with headquarters at Hankow.

Leaders of the organization, he said, were well educated, many of them having degrees from foreign universities, and speaking English and French fluently. All were thoroughly imbued with Soviet doctrines, he added.

The missionary, attached to the Franciscan mission at Wuchang, was captured Nov. 11 and taken to a stronghold in the mountains, where he was held despite efforts of Nationalist soldiery to liberate him.

BLAKESLEE FEARS CHINA-JAPAN WAR

Treaty of 1905 May Lead to a Future Clash, He Tells Foreign Policy Group Here.

SOVIETS FOUND STRONGER

Their Policies Veer Increasingly to the Left as Opposition Wanes, J. G. McDonald Reports.

The clash of national interests in Southern Manchuria may lead to war between the Chinese and Japanese within the next generation, Dr. George H. Blakeslee, Professor of History and International Relations at Clark University, told the Foreign Policy Association yesterday at its luncheon at the Hotel Astor.

Manchuria, where Russia, Japan and China all have interests at stake, constitutes the gravest menace to peace in the Far East, he declared. The 1905 treaty which ended the Russo-Japanese War, he said, by granting concessions and rights to Japan in Manchuria, created "a State within a State." Among Chinese, he asserted, the feeling is that nothing can be done now toward freeing "part of their homeland from foreign dominance," but that the issue "will lead to war in our children's time."

Stresses Need for Action.

The concensus among delegates to the Kyoto conference of the Institute for Pacific Relations at Kyoto last Summer was that something must be done to remove this sore spot from Far Eastern politics. At the round table discussions there, he said, it was brought out that China's desire was to regain political autonomy of Manchuria, while Japan was determined to maintain economic control. Some solution of the problem might be worked out along these lines, he thought. Similarly, Dr. Blakeslee said, he believed the less troublesome question of extraterritoriality and concessions would lend themselves to similar solutions.

He pointed to the need for better diplomatic machinery for handling the affairs of the Pacific States. Japan and the United States, the greatest of these powers, he said, have no arbitration treaty that he knew of. Spokesmen from Great Britain and Japan at the Kyoto conference favored leaving matters to the League of Nations, some suggesting that the League should establish an "Eastern capital," functioning like that at Geneva, he declared.

American and Chinese delegates, however, favored the creation of some new regional organization for the settlement of differences between States in the Far East. Meanwhile, Dr. Blakeslee said he believed the institute was proving itself a helpful unofficial agency toward better understanding and amity.

Finds Soviets Gain Strength.

James G. McDonald, chairman of the Foreign Policy Association, reported on his observations in China and Russia which he visited after attending the Kyoto conference. The complexion of the Soviet has changed appreciably since 1923, he said. Today the prevailing tendency is toward the "left"; effective unity has been re-established within the Communist party and the authority of Moscow is disputed nowhere in the land, Mr. McDonald asserted.

Chief among the indications of the trend toward radicalism, Mr. McDonald cited the government's agricultural program.

"Now for the first time since the revolution," he said, "the Communist leaders have definitely set themselves the task of tearing the peasant from his small tract of land. They seek to have him pool his holding into large community or State farms. Ultimately, it is hoped that many of the peasants will become merely paid laborers, employed like the city workers, by the State."

Aside from the fact that this step is "a logical development of Communist policy," Mr. McDonald continued, two major considerations were influenced to undertake "this herculean job." These were: the determination that the Soviet must strip the peasant of his power "to starve the great cities," and the fact that the "Bolshevik policy of ruthless suppression of the rich peasant" robbed the poorer village folk of a rich neighbor from whom they could borrow, forcing them to turn naturally to the State for aid.

But, while the Communists make their plans for an industrial development which will produce more automobiles and tractors than the United States and make possible mechanical comforts of life on a broader scale than in America, the "breadlines in Moscow grow longer," Mr. McDonald said. The true Bolshevik, according to Mr. McDonald, merely shrugs his shoulders, draws his belt a little tighter and casts hopeful eyes toward the future.

Is Pessimistic on China.

Turning to China, Mr. McDonald said he found conditions there discouraging. Real political unity never has been achieved by the Nanking Nationalist Government, he said. Chiang Kai-shek, he found, has striven to impose "central control" on the country, but the divisional war lords, while agreeing on foreign questions, have been unable to "agree on basic domestic issues."

The government itself, Mr. McDonald asserted, "is a clumsy instrument," whose many boards, committees, councils and yuans never have been able to function in their own right. One of the basic reasons for the "Nationalist failure," he held, has been the deterioration of the Kuomintang itself. Many of the ablest groups within it have been expelled by Chian Kai-shek and his associates, and, although still supported by their local and provincial organizations, have no voice in the policies of the larger group. The Nationalist leaders themselves, he declared, have been guilty at least of the appearance of venality, and the suspicion of graft and corruption is widespread.

E. C. Carter, secretary of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, presided. In opening the discussion he said:

"The Institute of Pacific Relations fulfills a pre-governmental function of competent international public discussion. If in the future the institute is to render the most valuable preparatory service the two great antithetical republics, the United States of America and the Soviet State, should find a way of joining the League of Nations and these two powers must similarly discover the means of entering into full and direct diplomatic relations with each other."

MOSCOW EXULTANT AT VICTORY IN EAST

Press, Proud of Settlement by Mukden, Renews Its Attack on Secretary Stimson.

PRAVDA ESPECIALLY BITTER

Charges Attempt to Form Anti-Soviet Bloc—Diplomat Views American Move Cynically.

By WALTER DURANTY.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MOSCOW, Dec. 7.—Moscow is exultant today over the ratification by the Mukden Dictator, Chang Hsueh-liang of the Sino-Russian protocol, which is hailed as "the answer to foreign imperialists" and "the wreck of capitalist intervention."

The newspapers publish long extracts from the foreign press commenting on the powers' note, the Soviet answer and subsequent "explanations" of Secretary Stimson. To put it bluntly, Moscow is alarmed that the indignation which was the first reaction to the "intervention" has been succeeded by pride.

When the Paris Temps calls Maxim Litvinoff's answer to Secretary Stimson insolent, saucy and provocative, or L'Homme Libre says "none ever used such a tone to the mighty country of Hoover and Kellogg" the Russian chuckles gleefully, "Uncle Sam stuck out his chin at us and we pulled his beard."

The Communist youth Pravda—the raucous voice of self-conscious young Russia—quotes the dignified Kolnische Zeitung to support its contention that the powers' note had political, as well as pacific aims, that the intervention was an attempt to form an anti-Soviet bloc and that it failed dismally.

"Extracts from the world press," continues the Pravda, "show we are right in believing Secretary Stimson's action at the very moment Mukden was forced to accept our original conditions, as nothing but a test to see how strong the anti-Soviet bloc was. Only the German Vorwaerts can continue to whine about the 'creative' character of Stimson's move."

Economic Life, which from the outset has taken an unaccustomedly violent stand point, savagely assails Secretary Stimson's statement that the American initiative contributed to the preliminary Soviet-Mukden agreement.

A Tass report from America actually puts this surprising statement in the Secretary's mouth.

Economic Life says, "Apparently Mr. Stimson supposes his hearers and readers know nothing of the facts of the case. Yet the whole world is aware that Secretary Stimson began his feverish diplomatic activity, not when a Chinese general seized the railroad and raided Soviet territory and set mines in the out rivers. Perhaps Mr. Stimson thought those were 'peaceful measures' and not 'threats to peace.'

"It is true that in July he issued a secret memorandum to the powers proposing an international commission and a 'neutral' director for the settlement of the railroad conflict. We cannot imagine that Secretary Stimson was then ignorant of the Soviet conditions for a conference—conditions, be it noted, which we maintained from the outset and have not changed one jot after the complete debacle of the Mukden militarists, as a result of the punitive reprisal by the Far Eastern army.

"No, Mr. Stimson's note appeared after the appeal to the United States by Nanking, whose evident purpose was to prepare the road for the disavowal of any Soviet-Mukden agreement. Already a large part of the world press recognizes that Secretary Stimson is 'playing Nanking's game,' and none now believes that his action was dictated by friendship toward the Soviet Union."

It is, perhaps, not uninteresting to compare this diatribe with the rather cynical remarks of a foreign diplomat here—for obvious reasons nameless—to your correspondents today.

TEN MORE NATIONS REPLY TO PACT NOTE

Total of 29 Have Now Answered Stimson Statement on the Russo-Chinese Dispute.

NANKING APPROVES TERMS

Appointment of Tsai, Naming of Managers and Investigating Committee Are Satisfactory.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Ten additional replies were received by the State Department today from foreign governments in response to its invitations of last week-end to the powers party to the Kellogg anti-war treaty to urge peace upon Russia and China in the dispute over the Chinese Eastern Railway in Manchuria.

To date a total of twenty-nine nations have been heard from, all favorably, although several are not sending notes to either Russia or China, but merely expressing approval of the American attitude. Those heard from today which announced they were sending notes were Nicaragua, Chile and Rumania. Those who are awaiting further developments before deciding to send communications to either Moscow or Nanking were Hungary, Denmark, Switzerland, Austria, Venezuela, Greece and Canada.

Canada did not indicate what action it might take, but Great Britain has already dispatched notes to Russia and China along the lines of the American communication.

Russia's long-delayed reply to the communication of Secretary Stimson urging peace in Manchuria was received at the State Department late this afternoon, having been forwarded through the French Government. It was the same as that published in the press from Moscow last Wednesday morning.

Nanking Approves Agreement.

NANKING, Dec. 7 (AP.).—The Nationalist Foreign Office announced tonight that the government had approved the Mukden-Moscow preliminary agreement for settlement of the Chinese Eastern Railway dispute in Manchuria.

The Nationalist Government also approved the appointment of Tsai Yung-chen, Chinese Commissioner of Foreign Affairs at Mukden, as the government's representative at formal negotiations with the Russians.

The preliminary agreement, it is stated, specified:

First—Moscow will nominate the new manager and assistant manager of the Chinese Eastern Railway, subject to appointment by the board of directors.

Second—A joint Sino-Russian committee will investigate the railway controversy, placing the blame upon those responsible.

No neutral delegates, it was said, are members of the negotiating committee.

Nicaragua Joins With Us.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Dec. 7.—The Nicaraguan Foreign Minister, Señor Cordero Reyes, returned to Managua yesterday, claiming a successful mission to the other republics of Central America in the interest of the Central American cooperative diplomatic plan.

Señor Cordero Reyes's first official act upon returning to Managua was to express to the Russian and Chinese governments Nicaragua's hope that both countries cease useless bloodshed and arbitrate the Manchurian dispute in accordance with the Kellogg peace pact.

WRECKAGE OFF CAPE RACE.

HALIFAX, N. S., Dec. 7 (Canadian Press).—Two groups of wreckage, comparatively close together, were sighted this morning, according to a wireless message from Cape Race by C. H. Harvey, Agent General of the Marine and Fisheries Department here. Part of the wreckage was the forepart of a sailing vessel, sighted in 47.33 N., 49.37 W. The other was an unidentified abandoned schooner.

on the rocks with the seas crashing onto her decks.

Liner Signals Distress.

Big liners felt the force of the gale as well as the freighters. The 12,500-ton Blue Star liner Andalusia, bound from London to South America, sent distress messages saying her rudder was damaged fifty miles from Plymouth and that she was drifting in a rough sea. Temporary repairs were successful, however, and the Andalusia put into Falmouth safely. At Liverpool the Cunarder Carinthia was not able to come alongside the dock to pick up passengers for New York, and the Canadian Pacific Minnedosa, arriving from the St. Lawrence, could not land her passengers.

A Norwegian ship went ashore at Port Talbot, Wales. Other vessels in trouble were the Danish schooner Morgens Koch, ashore near Eastbourne; the Italian Lucania, 8,106 tons, stranded at Dover; the Italian San Marco, 3,076 tons, ashore at Portsmouth, and the Grimsby drifter Atmosphere, which went down in the North Sea with all her crew of eight rescued.

Forty-one Vessels in Trouble.

LONDON, Dec. 7 (AP.).—Forty-one ships and innumerable fishing boats and barges were in distress tonight off the coasts of Great Britain and Ireland after a seasonal hurricane that centred off the British Isles and extended as far as Spain and Scandinavia. The gale has caused a loss of life that will run into scores when all the deaths have been tabulated. It was one of the severest in many years.

When the steamer Frances Duncan went down on Thursday off Land's End there was a loss of sixteen lives. The crew of the Italian steamer Casmona abandoned ship after losing the rudder, but were rescued by the steamers Edinburgh Castle and Ablanza.

The gale which had raged over the Merseyside, near Liverpool, for twenty-four hours persisted tonight, but the wind had dropped to a seventy-mile-an-hour velocity. The Merseyside shipping was completely dislocated, with many liners embarrassed.

The steamer Deseado was unable to make port and dropped all anchors at the mouth of the Mersey to ride out the storm. It was bringing the twenty men of the shipwrecked crew of the British bark Garthpool, one of the last of the famous windjammers. The Garthpool went ashore on Nov. 12 at Boavista Island on the west coast of Africa while en route to Australia. All of the crew escaped, but the bark was a total loss.

The liners Hector and Nestor of the Blue Funnel Line delayed sailing for the Far East.

Even in the harbor there was considerable danger among the ships awaiting abatement of the storm. Many were dragging anchors and collisions were narrowly averted.

Shipping offices said that bookings valued at $4,000 to carry persons to the Carnera-Stribling fight in Paris were canceled.

More than 120 feet of the Dover seawall had crumbled tonight under the pounding of the storm.

The Selsey lifeboat returned safely after 13 hours of battling against mountainous seas off the Sussex coast in response to an S O S from the Hungarian steamer Honved, which finally made port by its own efforts.

Storm Hits Scotland.

The steamer Neville went ashore near Barry Island and, lashed by heavy seas, was in a dangerous position.

The Spanish steamer Sebastian was in a distressed condition and her captain reported her in grave danger of having her wireless cabin washed away.

The Spanish steamer Galdames reported to the Land's End wireless station that she required immediate assistance.

A vessel whose identity could not be ascertained was reported in distress near Berry Head with a steamer standing by, unable to render help until the weather moderated. The ship in distress was laden with timber.

The Firth of Forth and the West Coast of Scotland were swept by fierce seas. The steamer Oakgrove was hurled ashore, but was refloated later. A life-boat and life-lines were used to rescue the crew of a fishing boat which was trying to enter Girvan Harbor.

Lloyd's reported that the liner Aba, from Liverpool for West Africa, was asking assistance, her steering gear was disabled seventy miles west of Ushant. The Aba, 7,900 tons, is understood to carry a number of passengers.

The rocket apparatus was taken out and the New Haven life-boat launched to assist a vessel, believed to be the Largolaw, out of control with steering gear damaged, off Dungeness.

Maritime mishaps reported at Lloyd's included the British steamer John Charlton, ashore at New Haven. The crew was being rescued. The Italian steamer Johnny wanted assistance off Penzance.

The storm caused the Thames to overflow its banks at Maidenhead tonight, turning a stream into the principal streets, where it flowed at seven miles an hour. Civic authorities took emergency measures to aid the inhabitants.

New Bond Street, in the heart of London, was closed to traffic and pedestrians were warned to keep away. An art gallery dating from the time of Lord Nelson had been weakened by the gale and was in imminent danger of collapse. The building had been shored up for the past six weeks because an adjoining building was being torn down.

Eight persons were killed in the interior of the British Isles by falling chimneys, uprooted trees, broken windows and falling walls.

Coast of France Hard Hit.

PARIS, Dec. 7 (AP.).—The tempest which swept the entire Atlantic coastline of France last night and today greatly afflicted the fishing fleets, hampered navigation in general, toppled over chimneys and uprooted trees.

From Douarnenez came a report that a distress signal had been hoisted on the La Vielle lighthouse. No craft was able to put out during the day to the assistance of the lightkeepers.

S O S signals were received from a number of craft in the English Channel and tugs fought their way out to render assistance.

The liner Homeric reached Cherbourg twelve hours late after two days of struggle with the gale. Four passengers, including Georges Carpentier, the boxer, suffered slight injuries. Officers of the ship said that the storm was the worst they had encountered for a quarter of a century.

Late today the vessel was forced to heave to for an hour because of the terrific buffeting and did not make port until late evening. There had been reports that the Homeric had taken the crew from a sinking vessel but it appeared that the Homeric had been confused with the Baltic, which had made such a rescue.

Great excitement was caused on board the Cunarder Lancastria during an electrical storm over the English Channel last night. Lightning burned out part of the radio apparatus but did no extensive damage.

From all along the coast came reports of fishing vessels washed against rocks or sunk in harbors by the violence of the winds. Brest reported that a woman was drowned when the Danish steamer Helen sank during the storm in the Gulf of Gascony. All others on board were saved by the salvage tug Iroise.

In Paris chimneys were blown down, one roof was torn away and many trees were uprooted. All airplane services were canceled.

Three Mexicans Die in Cold.

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 7 (AP.).—Three men have died of exposure during a cold wave which struck Mexico City last Sunday and which has persisted since.

The victims were homeless and were accustomed to sleeping out of doors.

HEAVY FOG DELAYS SHIPPING IN HARBOR

Vessels at Sea Will Arrive From 24 to 36 Hours Late Because of Storms.

Ships in the harbor were delayed yesterday by fog. Those at sea were kept back by westerly gales and will be from twenty-four to thirty-six hours late in arriving. The fog came down shortly after 1 A. M. and residents within two miles of the North and East Rivers were kept awake until dawn by the boat whistles and the booming horns at the ferry slips.

The White Star liner Majestic just managed to get clear of the Ambrose Channel before the fog shut down and blanketed everything. The French liner Ile de France and the Vulcania of the Cosulich Line, also escaped delay.

The weather began to clear at 7:45 A. M. and an hour later the visibility was fully a quarter of a mile, so that the ferryboats, which had been running ten minutes behind their schedules, were able to return to normal time.

The fog had cleared away before the Long Island steamboats began to come through Hell Gate, so they were not affected by it. The Presidente Wilson of the Cosulich Line and the Santa Inez of the Grace Line also went to their piers without delay.

The Volendam of the Holland-America Line is the only Atlantic liner due to arrive today and the Roma of the Itala-America Line is the only one due tomorrow. The others which were due have been held over until Tuesday, including the Republic of the United States Lines and the Baltic of the White Star Line, each of which carries a crew rescued from a fishing schooner. The Cunarder Laconia, the Stuttgart of the North German Lloyd and the Minnekahda of the Atlantic Transport Lines also are to arrive on Tuesday. The Anchor liner Caledonia is not expected until Wednesday. The Bremen, Berengaria and France are expected to arrive Tuesday evening or Wednesday morning.

No accidents due to the stormy weather were reported by radio yesterday. Incoming shipmasters reported the weather as very rough but not unusual for the season.

The motorship St. Louis of the Hamburg American Line arrived thirty hours late from the Channel ports due to storms all the way across. A few passengers suffered bruises from falling about. The worst weather was experienced on the night of Dec. 1, according to Captain Frederich Buch, the master, and one sea rocked the vessel so violently from stem to stern that the piano on the musician's platform broke adrift. The same sea carried away the furniture in the garden lounge on the promenade deck and swept it along aft. The 460 passengers on board seemed glad to land.

RESCUERS SAVE CREW JUST AS VESSEL SINKS

Seas too Wild for Small Boats, So Newfoundland Skipper Runs Steamer Against Schooner.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. JOHN'S, N. F., Dec. 7.—Nine men and two women were landed here today with a dramatic story of their rescue from the schooner Merry Widow ten minutes before she sank some miles off the coast. The rescue was achieved in seas that made the successful launching of small boats impossible, but Captain Winsor of the rescue steamer Beothic let his vessel drift broadside against the Merry Widow, his crew lined the rails and the men and women of the doomed schooner jumped into their arms. Every one on board was saved. The ships had separated only a few yards when the Merry Widow sank.

That job done, the Beothic coaled and again started out with her crew of veteran Newfoundlanders on a search for the two fishing schooners still missing since last week's storm.

It was on Wednesday that the Beothic sighted the Merry Widow, her ensign upside down in the rigging.

Captain Blackwood of the schooner asked to be towed to land. A line was put on board and towing started at dark.

At midnight the rope broke and owing to a terrific wind and sea the Beothic was unable to run another line aboard. She stood by until yesterday morning, when she again started towing.

Yesterday afternoon the Merry Widow again flew ensign upside down and Captain Blackwood said her deck and side beams had opened up and water was pouring into her hold.

Captain Winsor then manoeuvred the Beothic alongside and the rescue followed.

From now until Christmas Russeks Fifth Avenue will remain open until 6 P. M.

TOC H LAMPS LIT BY PRINCE OF WALES

10,000 Members in Albert Hall in London Cheer Him After Silent Tribute to War Dead.

HE ATTENDS ABBEY SERVICE

Gives Wooden Crosses From Graves In Flanders to Representatives—Members Here Hold Ritual.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 7.—The old comradeship of Toc H, the brotherhood of service founded during the war, was renewed today on its fourteenth birthday, when the Prince of Wales attended a thanksgiving service at Westminster Abbey and later presided at a festival in Albert Hall.

It was a memorable day in the history of Toc H, which had its beginnings in a club for officers and men in Flanders and now numbers more than 20,000 members. The Prince at the festival lit forty new "Lamps of Maintenance" with the flame from his own lamp, which he gave in memory of his friends killed in the war and which burns perpetually in All Hallows Church. Each was for the maintenance of new Toc H groups in the United States, Canada, South Africa, Brazil, New Zealand and Mexico. When all had been lit nearly 700 lamps were glowing like stars in the vast Albert Hall.

The lights were dimmed and the lamps appeared as flickering points of flame raised in rows before the Prince on the platform. All the 10,000 members present stood for a minute in silence in memory of their friends who "went west"—and then the lights went up to a roar of cheers for the Prince.

Amid cheers the Prince announced that Sir Charles Wakefield, former Lord Mayor of London, had bought Talbot House at Popeninghe, the cradle of the movement, and had presented it to Toc H.

"This action," the Prince declared, "will rejoice the hearts of the members of Toc H al lover the world."

Lord Plumer, who commanded the British Army in Flanders, assisted the Prince at the Abbey service. Before a hushed congregation the Prince handed eleven wooden crosses from Flanders graves to the representatives of eleven Toc H branches. He also presented two other crosses to central Toc H organizations, both crosses bearing the name of Gilbert Talbot, for whose club at Poperinghe Toc H was named. Talbot was killed in the first liquid fire attack in 1915. One of the crosses in his memory will be cherished in All-Hallows Church and the other in Leeds, where he was born.

Coincident with the London ceremonies, members of Toc H from New York City, Washington and Philadelphia met last night in the Madison Square Hotel and went through a similar ritual involving the lighting of the organization's emblematic lamp, following a dinner. There were songs, hymns and prayers.

Today there will be a general business meeting at the local headquarters, 27 West Twenty-fifth Street, after the delegates have attended corporate communion services at Trinity Chapel in Twenty-fifth Street and the Presbyterian Church of the Good Shepherd in West Sixty-sixth Street.

SCHACHT WON'T ANSWER REBUKE ON HIS NOTE

Reichsbank President Holds Attack on Young Plan Position Gave All Necessary Comment.

BERLIN, Dec. 7 (AP).—Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, president of the Reichsbank, does not intend to reply to yesterday's Cabinet statement rebuking him for his recent criticism of the financial and reparations situation in Germany. Dr. Schacht takes the position that he said all he had to say in his memorandum and that consequently no further comment is necessary.

The government intends to make its financial policy a question of confidence in the Reichstag next week.

With the first excitement over Dr. Schacht's action in publishing his memorandum out of the way, political circles now believe that the Cabinet will have no difficulty in securing a vote of confidence. It is expected that Chancellor Mueller will stress the fact that the late Foreign Minister, Dr. Stresemann, urged that financial reform be postponed for foreign political reasons until after the second Hague conference.

Dr. Schacht has undoubtedly hastened the government's reform proposals, but the position of Finance Minister Hilferding seems to be still strong as the Cabinet solidly rallied behind him. It was semi-officially emphasized that yesterday's government communique was the result of a unanimous decision of the Cabinet and not of a mere majority.

President von Hindenburg discussed the situation with Chancellor Mueller today.

JAMES M. LEE LEFT ESTATE TO HIS WIDOW

Will of Editor-Educator Written on University Letterhead—Personalty 'Exceeds $10,000.'

The will of James Melvin Lee, director of the department of journalism at New York University and prominent as an editor, author and educator, was filed yesterday in Surrogates' Court. It leaves all of his estate to his widow, Helen Wellner Lee of 61 Tiemann Place, who is named coexecutrix with the Corn Exchange Bank.

The petition for probate submitted by Mrs. Lee estimates the value of her husband's realty at $1,500 and the personality at more than $10,000. Counsel for the estate declined to give a more definite evaluation.

The testament was executed on June 15, 1928, on a letterhead of the university's department of journalism. It consists of one typewritten page and directed that in the event that the widow predeceased the testator, his estate should go to their daughter, Cora Virginia Lee, 20 years old, who resides with her mother.

Mr. Lee died of pleurisy on Nov. 17.

Gamecocks Held as Evidence Turn Into Peaceful Hens

How nine tough fighting cocks became as many peaceful Rhode Island hens within four days and a small barn is a source of great mystification to the natives of Pompton Plains, N. J.

The birds—the gamecocks—had been locked up for "evidence" following a raid last Sunday in a Greenwood hotel. Justice of the Peace Finn of Pompton Plains, accompanied by Franklin C. Bruen, S. P. C. A. agent, of Paterson and State Trooper Holzschup broke up a cock fight which was being witnessed by fifty men.

Besides the nine gamecocks the raiders found George Fahme of Paterson trying to hide a dead rooster in a grandfather's clock. Fahme was fined $25. The fowl evidence was locked up in the barn of Julius Kurtz.

The S. P. C. A. official went to see them Thursday. He heard them cluck with contentment and verified the metamorphosis. Kurtz expressed astonishment, but told Bruen that Holzschup had inspected the poultry the day before.

BAKER QUESTIONS M'CORMICK'S DOCTOR

Counsel Offers Medical Report for 1922-23 Showing That Patient Had Improved.

SANTA BARBARA, Cal., Dec. 7 (AP).—Newton D. Baker, chief counsel for Mrs. Katherine McCormick in her fight for guardianship of her husband, Stanley McCormick, today cross examined Dr. Nathaniel Brush, assistant resident physician for ten years.

Mrs. McCormick is seeking to oust Harold McCormick and Mrs. Anita McCormick Blaine, brother and sister of the mental invalid, as his guardians and trustees of his $50,000,000 estate, on the ground that the fortune is being dissipated and the patient is not improving.

Mr. Baker dug into the mental and physical history of McCormick. He uncovered information that the patient had made considerable progress from year to year since 1917, but that he had some slumps and also periods as far back as 1920 when he was able to converse coherently and lengthily.

Testifying that he first saw the patient in 1917, Dr. Brush said that when he became resident physician two years later he found considerable improvement.

"I got the impression," the witness said, "that in my two years away he had gotten things to fill his mind."

Mr. Baker asked how he was at Christmas in 1922.

"As I recall he was not very good," the physician replied.

Mr. Baker read from the doctor's own medical report in which he said that by all means this was the best and most pleasant Christmas enjoyed by the patient in years.

Dr. Brush said that in 1923, as he recalled, Christmas then also was not very good. Mr. Baker read again from his medical report that the patient was very pleasant in the mornings, was cheerful when he opened his Christmas gifts, arranged the gifts in a circle around the Christmas tree and seemed to enjoy himself most of the day.

CATHOLIC ALUMNAE HONOR TWO LEADERS

Mrs. Armstring, Big Sisters' Head, and Mrs. McGoldrick, Movie Censor, Are Luncheon Guests.

Lady Margaret Armstrong, wife of the British Consul General, who is president of the Catholic Big Sisters, and Mrs. Thomas A. McGoldrick, chairman of the federation's motion picture reviewing board, were guests of honor yesterday at the annual communion breakfast of the International Federation of Catholic Alumnae at the Hotel Plaza.

The luncheon followed the annual mass and corporate communion of the organization in St. Patrick's Cathedral. Bishop John J. Dunn was the celebrant.

Miss Corinne Roche, regent of the circle, delivered an address of welcome. The toastmaster was Miss Catherine J. McEntegart.

Tributes were paid to Lady Armstrong and Mrs. McGoldrick by Mgr. John P. Chidwick, pastor of St. Agnes's Church, who represented Cardinal Hayes; the Rev. Matthew Fortier, head of the School of Social Service of Fordham, who represented the Rev. William J. Duane, president of the university, and the Rev. Francis P. LeBuffe of the faculty, moderator of the circle.

"We meet this morning in a spirit of jubilation," said Miss Roche. "Particularly are we happy today that Fordham University has conferred the degree of Doctor of Laws upon two of our members, Lady Armstrong and Mrs. McGoldrick."

Lady Armstrong, who received an ovation on being presented, said:

"As a Catholic woman I want to pay tribute to the noble Protestant and Jewish women who have worked side by side with me in the courts through these years. This has been my first opportunity to thank publicly that great university of Fordham."

Mrs. McGoldrick said that her committee had worked until now it had an organization of forty Catholic college graduates in Hollywood censoring pictures.

SAYS CAROL ASKS RETURN.

Rumanian Paper Reports Intervention by Friend—Maniu Opposed.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BUCHAREST, Dec. 7.—The newspaper Cuventul, a pro-government organ, states that Prince Carol, through his friend, M. Gutowsky, has asked the government to raise the prohibition against his returning to Rumania. This prohibition expires normally in 1936.

Premier Maniu, it is learned, has declared the present time inopportune for Carol's return.

The answer to the request of the American Minister, Charles S. Wilson that Rumania should associate herself with the other powerse in intervention in the Manchuria dispute under the Kellogg pact with a view to preserving peace, says that such a step is only possible if the other members of the Little Entente and Poland concur. Steps to secure this have already been taken.

SWITALSKI CABINET RESIGNS IN POLAND

President Accepts, Asking It to Carry On Until a New Government Is Formed.

DECISION UP TO PILSUDSKI

Matuszewski, Finance Minister, Is Likely Choice as Premier, but Bitter Foe of Left Is Mentioned.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

WARSAW, Dec. 7.—Immediately after the government's defeat was announced in the Sejm last night Premier Switalski drove to the Belvedere to see Marshal Pilsudski and stayed there till 4 o'clock this morning. At noon a meeting of the Cabinet decided upon its resignation and President Moscicki accepted, asking that the Cabinet carry on till the formation of a new government.

Finance Minister Matuszewski, who made a good impression in the Sejm debate Thursday, is most likely to become Premier, and his selection might have a conciliatory effect. Another name mentioned is that of the Minister of Labor, Colonel Prystor, a die-hard supporter of Marshal Pilsudski and the Minister most hated by the Left groups. President Moscicki today called on Marshal Pilsudski, whose decision will, of course, be final.

The press had little if any comment today on last night's vote of no confidence. The Opposition, of course, is satisfied over the success of its first attempt to censure the government since Marshal Pilsudski's coup in May of 1926. Government circles, however, do not take the vote as a serious indication of the Opposition's readiness to form an alternative government. The Opposition strength, they say, is numerical only and the leaders of the heterogeneous Opposition would be much perplexed if they were asked by the President to form a new Cabinet.

A prominent Pilsudski Deputy explained the situation by saying, "We sacrifice Switalski to be devoured by the Opposition, but the same system of government must remain."

Whatever the outcome of the crisis may be, economic circles maintain that it is for the country's good that the suspense is ended at last. The political uncertainty, a state of no peace and no war, between the government and the Sejm was considered worst of all, worse than an avowed dictatorship or the weakest parliamentary government would be. Now there is hope at last that the prolonged crisis has passed.

CZECH CABINET IS FORMED.

Udrzal Heads Bourgeois-Socialist Government.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PRAGUE, Dec. 7.—After more than a month of bargaining between the fifteen odd political parties represented in the new Czechoslovakian Parliament elected at the end of October, a Bourgeois-Socialist Government has been formed under Premier Franz Udrzal.

It comprises in Parlia ment forty-six Czech and sixteen German Agrarians, twenty-five members of the Clerical Czech People's party, fourteen National Democrats and twelve members of the Czech Business party, who compose the bourgeois bloc, as well as forty-three Czech and twenty-one German Social Democrats and thirty-two Czech National Socialists, who make up the Socialist bloc. It is thus more of a Socialist Government than the one which preceded it and for the first time since the founding of the Czechoslovakian State contains eGrman Social Democrats.

The new Cabinet will consist of twelve Czechs, two Slovaks and two Germans. Dr. Edouard Benes, who has been Foreign Minister ever since the founding of the republic, will continue to hold the past. The only new Ministers are Dr. Franz Matousek, Trade; Jan Dostalek, Public Works; Bohumir Pradac, Agriculture, and Dr. Ludwig, Social Welfare.

The Communists, German Nationalists, German National Socialists, German Christian Socialists, Slovakian People's party and both Hungarian parties will form the Opposition.

PORTO RICO TO MARK DAY.

Gov. Roosevelt Calls on Islanders to Observe Golden Rule Sunday.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SAN JUAN, Porto Rico, Dec. 7.—Asking that Porto Rico observe Golden Rule Sunday, Governor Roosevelt made known today he would expect no one to do what was not being done at the Governor's palace, where tomorrow's dinner will be limited to the chief island dishes, codfish, rice and beans.

The churches generally observe the day, making an appeal here for aid for children. Several local gifts were announced today, one for $500 from Ramon Valdes, and others ranging up to $100 from groups and individuals.

The Hotel Baleares at Arecibo sent word to the Governor that the guests there would observe the day.

PRINCE SCORES VIVISECTION

Saxon Nobleman, Now a Monk, Delivers Lecture in Geneva.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

GENEVA, Dec. 7.—The Prince of Saxony, brother of the former King of Saxony, who renounced his royal rights and distributed his large fortune to charities even before the war in order to become a Catholic monk, gave a lecture here last night against vivisection and the "annual cruel and useless massacre of dumb animals in medical laboratories and institutions of the world."

The Prince is a professor of theology in the Swiss University of Fribourg, where he lives as an ordinary monk. His nephew, the former Crown Prince of Saxony, also renounced the world to become a priest five years ago.

GUARD LONDON LEGATIONS.

Police Mystified by Red Fluid on Our Embassy Steps.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 7.—Police are guarding all the embassies, legations and consulates in London tonight following the discovery of a quantity of red fluid splashed on the steps of the American Embassy chancery.

The chancery, which is used as Ambassador Dawes's business offices, is opposite the garden entrance to Buckingham Palace. On a call from the hall porter detectives hurried to the spot and found a sack of straw and paper in the doorway. So far the police have been mystified by the incident.

R. Stanley Dollar Pays $11,489 to Customs After Hearing on Failure to Declare Goods

R. Stanley Dollar, head of the Dollar Steamship Company and son of the founder of the line, paid $11,489.26 in forfeiture values and penalties at the custom house yesterday after a hearing before the legal department of the Custom Division.

Mr. Dollar, accompanied by his wife and family, returned last Friday on the United States liner Leviathan after a voyage around the world. When he entered the port he had an expedite order which gave him the immediate attention of Customs Inspectors. The order was granted by order of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Lowman in Washington.

Three special agents of the Treasury Department aided in the examination of the Dollar family's twenty-nine pieces of baggage and after three hours on the pier with Mr. Dollar requested him to appear at the custom house yesterday. Six pieces of luggage, said to have contained a considerable amount of clothing and some jewelry which was not on the declaration, were taken to the Appraiser's Stores.

Yesterday Mr. Dollar appeared before George Brewer, Assistant Solicitor of the Port, who inspected the declaration before Howarth Lewis, Mr. Dollar's representative in New York and an attorney for the line.

The value of the undeclared dutiable wearing apparel and other articles was placed at $5,744.16 by Mr. Brewer and the total amount due the customs was placed at $11,489.26. This included the penalty for failure to declare and the forfeiture value of the goods which is imposed following seizure.

The hearing was held privately and the result made public later. It is understood Mr. Dollar explained to Mr. Brewer that the undeclared clothing had been purchased by members of the family during the voyage, and since it had been worn he did not think it was dutiable.

After Mr. Brewer's decision the sum was paid without further comment and Mr. Dollar left immediately.

ASKS HOOVER'S AID IN REPEALING TAX

Florenz Ziegfeld Criticizes the Impost on Theatre Tickets Above $3 as 'Unwarranted.'

Criticizing the tax on theatre tickets as "needless, unjustifiable and unwarranted," Florenz Ziegfeld said last night that he has asked President Hoover's aid in repealing the tax and has received a reply stating that the matter would be carefully considered. According to Mr. Ziegfeld, the President desires more information on the subject and the producer expects to have an interview during the week of Dec. 16, at which time the situation will be discussed.

"The government does not tax admission to the motion picture houses, but it is still continuing to do so in the legitimate houses," Mr. Ziegfeld said. "A theatrical production generally gives eight performances a week, whereas the film houses give several every day. Naturally, their grosses are tremendous compared to those of the legitimate theatres. That is another reason why the picture industry can afford to pay munificent sums to all concerned in turning out its product. With conditions as they are at present, the legitimate theatres throughout the country should be taken into consideration."

In June of last year the tax on theatre tickets costing $3 or less was exempted. According to estimates made at that time the loss to the government amounted to $17,000,000.

Since $3 admission prices are practically unknown in the motion picture theatres, Mr. Ziegfeld hoped that the government would make some adjustment more equitable to the theatrical producers.

ONLY 577 UNEMPLOYED RECORDED IN FRANCE

Country Almost Alone Among Industrial Nations in Having Plenty of Work for Idle.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Dec. 7.—While Great Britain struggles with the problem of how to find work for more than 1,000,000 men and women, and the United States also faces a formidable total of unemployed, France is almost alone among industrial nations in having only 577 unemployed. This total is for Nov. 30 and includes 139 women.

Seventy-five per cent of this small number is within the Paris district. To meet almost a chronic shortage of labor, the French Government has made labor agreements with various European governments, insuring a steady flow of workers into the country. From Nov. 25 to Nov. 30 a total of 2,385 foreign workmen entered France, while 654 returned to their homes.

PLACE FOR MRS. OWEN.

Bryan's Daughter to Go on Foreign Affairs Committee.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Representative Ruth Bryan Owen, daughter of the late William Jennings Bryan, is slated for a place on the Committee on Foreign Affairs as a result of action taken by the House today.

On motion of Representative Tilson of Connecticut, the Republican leader, the membership of the Foreign Affairs Committee was increased from twenty-one to twenty-two. The new place, by agreement, is to go to Mrs. Owen.

MEET TO DRINK COFFEE BUT GET QUESTIONNAIRE

Six of Columbia Experimental Group Receive No Beverage, but All Take Intelligence Test.

Instead of drinking countless cups of coffee under the watchful eyes of psychologists, the thirty-six Columbia students who participated in the first of three experiments on the effects of the beverage found yesterday morning that their major task was answering a questionnaire.

Two cups of unsweetened coffee were the most any of the students had to drink. One-third of the group drank nothing at all. The rest divided their attention between "decaffeinated" coffee and a popular brand of breakfast coffee.

Thereafter from 10 to almost 2 o'clock the entire group concentrated on an intelligence test. Norman P. Lyon, who is conducting the experiments for his master's degree, had explained earlier in the morning that it would require at least three months to correlate the results, and that he himself had not the slightest idea of what the tests would prove.

The mystery shrouding the experiment was lightened partly by an announcement that the experiments are intended to "determine the effects of caffein upon the elementary motor and mental capacities."

The second experiment is to take place next Saturday, and the concluding one on the following Monday. The eighteen young men and eighteen young women participating are receiving $1 an hour.

PALL OF NIGHT COVERS CHICAGO IN DAYTIME

Shoppers Grope Way in Loop District—Three Gunmen Rob Jewelry Store.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Dec. 7. — Christmas shoppers groped their way through darkness between 10 and 11 o'clock this morning when the blackest daylight "night" in Chicago's history wrapped the Loop and most of the city in a pall of darkness that might easily have been mistaken for midnight.

Three gunmen, taking advantage of the darkness, bound up three employes of the Thomas B. Panagon jewelry store at 406 South Wabash Avenue and escaped with gems valued at $2,000.

Every light in the downtown business district was turned on. Motorists crept along the slippery streets with headlights aglare. The air beacons on several Loop towers were lighted for groping airmen.

The darkness was the old story of latent air that permitted smoke, heavy clouds and possibly some fog to gather over the city, according to C. A. Donnell, government forecaster.

HONOR FOR JULIUS KAHN.

Medal Is Proposed for Late Head of House Military Committee.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Authority for the President to make a posthumous award of the Distinguished Service Medal to Julius Kahn, for several years chairman of the Military Affairs Committee in the House of Representatives, is sought in a joint resolution proposed yesterday by Representative W. Frank James of Michigan, now head of that committee.

Mr. Kahn's seat as a member from the Fourth California District is now held by his widow, Mrs. Florence P. Kahn.

CHURCHMEN STRIVE TO END PREJUDICES

Christian and Jewish Leaders Discuss Religious Amity at Meeting Here.

FIND SYMPATHY IS NEEDED

Dr. E. H. Wilkins, Rabbi Israel Goldstein and Dr. J. J. Walsh Represent Respective Creeds.

Religious differences and obstacles to a better understanding among Protestants, Jews and Catholics were discussed at a meeting held yesterday in the Knights of Columbus Club Hotel under the auspices of the Conference of Younger Churchmen in connection with the National Conference of Jews and Christians. The Rev. Cameron P. Hall, chairman of the Conference of Younger Churchmen, presided.

The speakers included Dr. Ernest Hatch Wilkins, president of Oberlin College; Rabbi Israel Goldstein of Congregation B'nai Jeshurun, and Dr. James J. Walsh, medical director of Fordham University. Following the speeches there was a period for questions and informal discussion, at which Dr. Daniel J. Fleming of the Union Theological Seminary presided.

"The desire for truth is a fundamental attribute of human beings," said Dr. Wilkins, "but each person is inclined to think that he possesses all truth. If in the light of the relative primitive position of human life each one will claim only a small per cent of truth, the humility of our realization will make us all wish to become comrades in the search for ultimate truth."

Rabbi Goldstein said he believed the conflicts between Christians and Jews resulted from "second-hand prejudices" and malconceptions of the Jewish race, handed down from earlier ages. Sunday school stories of the Crucifixion tended to prejudice the minds of children, he said, and cause them to regard the Jew as the "very incarnation of the devil." The principles of equality and liberty of the American Republic, he said, offered the greatest hope for understanding between Jews and Christians.

Dr. Walsh said he thought religious prejudice resulted from a lack of knowledge of other religions and that knowledge brought understanding and sympathy. He said those who wished to learn something of Judaism should consult Jews themselves and not their enemies.

Questions asked later indicated an interest as to whether Christian Sunday school teachings tended to cause prejudice toward Jews.

The appointment of a special committee under the chairmanship of Mrs. Estelle M. Sternberger of this city was announced by the Rev. Everett Clinchy, secretary of the National Conference of Jews and Christians, to inquire into the fundamental causes of prejudice and discrimination among religious groups.

JOHNSON'S HOUSE SAVED.

Residence in Gough Square Is to Be Preserved for Nation.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 7.—The house in Gough Square, off Fleet Street, which Dr. Johnson occupied for more than ten years and in which the lexicographer compiled the greater part of his dictionary, will be preserved for the nation.

It was purchased some time ago by Cecil Harmsworth, who has now formed a body of governors to hold the property in trust. A deed setting forth that the name "Dr. Johnson's house" shall never be changed and that the architectural features of the house shall be preserved intact, will be handed to the governors at a dinner in the house next Wednesday.

CALLED TO CONFER ON OCEAN MAILS

Prospective Bidders on New Contracts Invited by Brown to Capital.

EXPECTS BIDS BY FEB. 15

Representatives of Three Lines Indicate That They Are in Agreement With Shipbuilding Program.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Scores of representatives of shipping lines which contemplate bidding for a share of the $11,491,000 to be awarded in mail contracts were summoned today to confer Wednesday and Thursday with Postmaster General Brown.

The Postmaster General will lay before them his requirements for the construction within the next five years of twenty-nine vessels at a cost of $175,000,000. Representatives of lines now operating under poundage mail contracts will be on hand as well as officials of lines which are competing for the new contracts.

Following the conferences the Postmaster General said today advertising for bids for the new routes will go forward without delay, with the prospect that bids will be in his hands by Feb. 15.

An additional appropriation of approximately $6,000,000 will be asked by Postmaster General Brown when he goes before the House Committee on Appropriations Monday. It is understood that Congress will grant the request.

Indications that operators are generally in agreement with the proposed shipbuilding program were given to W. Irving Glover, Second Assistant Postmaster General, as chairman, and the members of the Subcommittee of the Interdepartmental Committee on Ocean Mail Awards today by representatives of the United States Lines, the Mississippi Steamship Company and the Munson Steamship Line.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

AMERICAN SINGERS CAPTIVATE BERLIN

Eleanor Rogers and Sydney Rayner Arouse Audiences to Enthusiasm.

RAYNER AT OPERA COMIQUE

Tito Schipa of the Chicago Civic Opera Also a Big Success at Philharmonic Concert.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Dec. 7.—Three singers from America made their Berlin débuts this week with great success. Eleanor Rogers, known here as Eleanor Ruggeri, carried a great audience at Bach Saal at will. She was compelled to give several encores and was practically buried under floral tributes. Mrs. Parker Gilbert and other prominent Americans were in the audience.

Earlier in the week Tito Schipa of the Chicago Civic Opera, known here as the "whispering tenor," delighted a big assembly at the Philharmonic Concert Hall with his falsetto, which ends in a wonderful forte never heard here before.

Such thunderous applause as was accorded to Sydney Rayner of New Orleans tonight has seldom been heard in any Berlin concert hall. Professor Kunwald, director of the Philharmonic Orchestra, which accompanied Mr. Rayner, told THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent he had never heard such a grand and clear voice. Mr. Rayner, who is first tenor at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, was induced by the enthusiastic throng to sing many encores, including two arias from "Rigoletto." He probably will sing "Rigoletto" at Berlin's State Opera.

Aguilar Lute Quartet Plays Again.

The Aguilar Lute Quartet, whose delightful and finished art has proved one of the leading features of the present musical season in New York, gave its third program in this city yesterday afternoon in Town Hall. The program comprised old and new Spanish music, compositions of Haydn and Bach arranged for the lutes, and many encores. The same instruments which performed music by the classic masters of the eighteenth century with such faultless taste and technical precision proved, in turn, the ideal vehicle for music of the essentially Spanish type, by Albeniz, Salazar, Turina and other contemporaries—thanks to the gifted interpreters. A large audience gave every sign of its pleasure.

MME. JERITZA IMPROVES.

Still in Pain From Wooden-Dagger Thrust—Hopes to Sing Tuesday.

Mme. Maria Jeritza, who has been confined to her apartment at the Hotel St. Regis since her accident on the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday night in the last act of "The Girl of the Golden West," was resting yesterday, but said that she was still suffering pain. The wooden sheath of the dagger in the hand of one of the chorus men struck the nerve centre in her left side and benumbed that part of the singer's body from the shoulder to the foot.

She hopes to be able to sing in Philadelphia on Tuesday night in "Turandot."

Mme. Jeritza has received sympathetic messages from many of her friends in the city and there have been many callers at the St. Regis to inquire about her health. Mme. Joseph Stransky spent the afternoon with her. Signor Gatti-Casazza, the director of the Metropolitan Opera House, called on Friday afternoon and again yesterday.

ELLEN BALLON AS SOLOIST.

Pianist Gives Creditable Performance at Philharmonic Concert.

Ellen Ballon, pianist, was soloist at the Students' Concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Willem Mengelberg, last night in Carnegie Hall. The orchestral pieces were Franck's D minor symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

Miss Ballon played the seldom-heard Tchaikovsky concerto in G major. She was at her best in the finale, which she played with true brilliancy and virtuoso élan. She was not always the equal of the concerto as regarded sheer physical strength. The concerto itself is very poor Tchaikovsky. Under the circumstances Miss Ballon gave a creditable if not a masterly performance. The composition, such as it is, calls for more breadth and virility of style.

TANSMAN'S CONCERT TOUR.

Polish Composer and Pianist to Play Here on Dec. 17.

Alexander Tansman, Polish composer, pianist and conductor, is to arrive here next Tuesday on the France for his second tour of the United States. He will make his first New York appearance on Dec. 17 under the auspices of the Pro Musica Society in a program of his own compositions. The soloists will be Cobina Wright, soprano; Ottokar Cadek, Ludwig Schwab and Bedrich Vaska of the New York String Quartet and woodwind players of the Pan-American Ensemble.

Mr. Tansman will make appearances as soloist with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 27, 28 and 31. His subsequent tour will take him to the Pacific Coast.

EDITH M'CORMICK FINISHES LOVE SONGS

Former Miss Rockefeller Makes Public Third Number in Her Cycle.

CHICAGO, Dec. 7 (AP.).—The final number of the "Love Song Cycle," written by Mrs. Edith Rockefeller McCormick, with music by Mrs. Eleanor Everest Freer, was made public today. Its title is "Love."

Previous numbers were "How Can We Know?" and "I Write Not to Thee, Dearest," written in 1925 and 1927, respectively.

The words of Mrs. McCormick's poem follow:

Love is not a mendicant
Who goes from door to door,
And asks for food and shelter
Just to ask for more and more.

Love is not a tyrant,
With all commanding tone,
Who gives and gives and gives again,
Nor questions for his loan.

Love is not a watcher
Who's always on his guard
To catch the straying footsteps
And look for his reward.

Love is so evasive
To wishing child of man
That only God's great compass
Can trace where it has been.

In August, 1925, a Milwaukee firm published the words of Mrs. McCormick's song, "How Can We Know?" which treats of an agony of doubt, a groping in uncertainty, with the triumphant climax:

—No earth-stain'd judgment of men,
And no fire-prov'd power of the gods,
Can take this knowledge from us.
For we know through the trust born of love.

The last of the three stanzas of the second song, "I Write Not to Thee, Dearest," published in 1927, is as follows:

The fairest dew of God-made morn
Is frail enough to be the tears
That fall from my eyes, dearest,
Because I cannot see.

THE SCALA OPENS SEASON.

Respighi Conducts His "Sunken Bell"—Toscanini's Loss Deplored.

MILAN, Italy, Dec. 7 (AP.).—With a performance of Respighi's "Sunken Bell," conducted by the composer, the Scala, Italy's most famous opera theatre, opened its Winter season tonight. The house was full.

Milan's operagoers are still disconsolate over the loss of their noted conductor, Arturo Toscanini, who is now in America. To make up for it the Scala will give fourteen operas and two new ballets. Later the Wagnerian "Tetralogy" will be given and Siegfried Wagner, son of the composer, will be asked to conduct.

Toscanini's baton will be wielded by Guarneri, De Sabata, Del Campo and Calusio, as well as Respighi. Thanks to Premier Mussolini's interest, the theatre boasts a working capital of about $631,500.

Robeson to Sing in Native Princeton

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., Dec. 7.—Paul Robeson will return to Princeton on Dec. 16 to give his first concert in his native town, under the auspices of the Princeton Music Committee, of which Mrs. Williamson Updike Vreeland is chairman. The proceeds will go to a local negro church. Mr. Robeson's father was pastor of one of the negro churches here. The singer was a student at Rutgers University after attending Princeton schools. The concert is to be held in Alexander Hall on the Princeton University campus.

'Butterfly' and 'La Gioconda' Sung.

"Madame Butterfly" was repeated at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon with a familiar cast, including Mmes. Rethberg, Bori, Jeraka and Wells and Messrs. Tokatyan, Scotti, Ananian, Malatesta, Bada and Picco. Mr. Bellezza conducted.

The popular Saturday night subscription bill was "La Gioconda," with Mmes. Corona, Telva and Swarthout and Messrs. Jagel, Basiola, Pasero, D'Angelo, Paltrinieri, Gandolfi and Gabor. Mr. Serafin conducted.

Third Concert for Children.

Ernest Schelling conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra yesterday morning in Carnegie Hall in the third concert of the first series for children. The program listed French and German works, including the prelude to "Lohengrin," the andante from Strauss's concerto for horn, Saint-Saëns's septuor for trumpet, piano and strings; Poulenc's sonata for horn, trumpet and trombone; the "Irish" from Hadley's "Silhouettes," and Chabrier's "Rhapsody España."

Bess Meredith Weds Curtiz.

Special to The New York Times.

LOS ANGELES, Dec. 7.—Bess Meredith, scenario writer, and Michael Curtiz, film director, were married here today in the chambers of Traffic Judge Valentine. After the ceremony the wedding party had luncheon at the Roosevelt Hotel. The marriage license was issued to the couple under the real names, which were Mrs. Helen Lucas and Mihaly Kertescz. The bride was born in New York and the bridegroom in Hungary.

GEN. MONRO DEAD; SAVED BRITISH ARMY

Sir Charles Successfully Withdrew From Gallipoli in World War.

HEADED FORCES IN INDIA

Went There After Brief Appointment to First Army—Fought in South Africa.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 7.—General Sir Charles Monro, the military commander responsible for the safe withdrawal of the British forces from Gallipoli in 1915, died at his home here today after several weeks' illness. He recently retired as Governor and Commander-in-chief at Gibraltar, which post he had held for five years.

When he arrived at Gallipoli in October, 1915, General Monro found the Allied forces in a position that, as he said later in his official report, "presented a military situation unique in history. The force held a line possessing every possible military defect. Complete evacuation was the only wise course, as an advance could not be regarded as a reasonable military operation."

The subsequent retirement of the troops and their removal to Saloniki was accomplished successfully, the operation reflecting the highest credit on the British commander, who was soon afterward rewarded with the appointment to the command of the First Army in France, in succession to Marshal Haig. He held the latter post for but a brief period, as the War Office sent him to India as commander-in-chief of the British armies. There he remained for four years, ranking next to the Viceroy, with a salary of nearly $50,000 a year, official residences at Simla and Delhi and allowances only slightly less than his salary.

Sir Charles spent half a century in the British Army. He served in India in 1879-80 and in the South African War. From 1901 to 1903 he was chief instructor in the Musketry School. When the World War began he was at the head of a territorial division. During 1914 he was in command of the Second Division. The next year, until sent to the Dardanelles to succeed General Sir Ian Hamilton, he led the Third Army Corps.

Sir Charles married in 1912 the Hon. Mary Towneley O'Hagan, eldest daughter of the first Baron O'Hagan, who was Lord High Chancellor of Ireland.

KELBERINE GIVES RECITAL.

Pianist Shows Good Technical Equipment at Town Hall.

Alexander Kelberine, pianist, appeared in recital last evening at Town Hall. The program included two preludes by Bach, one transcribed by the pianist; the Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue by the same composer; the thirty-two variations in C minor by Beethoven, and Chopin's Fantasy in F minor. A final Russian group was devoted to pieces by Scriabine, Medtner and Balakireff and "a first performance" of Koutzen's "Enigma."

Ability to communicate the emotion which the artist apparently felt seemed lacking. His tone, crisp and clear, especially in heavy chords, would have gained much by an addition of portamento to contrast the alternate legato and staccato. In general, Mr. Kelberine's technical equipment was good, though a tendency to adapt his tempo to the exigencies of passages demanding digital velocity, plus a liberal use of the "loud" pedal, made for slight turgidity of tone-color.

A large audience greeted the pianist warmly.

SING IN SIGN LANGUAGE AT GIBSON FUNERAL

Soloists Deaf, Also Minister and 1,500 in Audience—Tribute to Their Champion.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Dec. 7.—Hymns sung in the sign language by three deaf soloists, a sermon delivered by a deaf minister and the rites of the National Fraternal Society of the Deaf today marked the funeral services for Francis P. Gibson of Evanston, founder and for thirty years president of the society. More than 1,500 deaf persons, including delegates of the society from many States, paid tribute to their leader.

Standing on a platform at one end of the Skeels-Rockefeller Memorial Chapel, the Rev. Philip J. Hasenstab, pastor of the Methodist Mission for the Deaf, spoke in the sign language.

At the other end of the chapel Mrs. Gust Hyman, matron of the Illinois Home for the Aged Deaf, repeated the sermon in sign language for the benefit of those who could not see the minister. At the right of Mr. Hasenstab, his daughter, Mrs. Constance Elmes, repeated aloud her father's sign words for the relatives and friends of Mr. Gibson who could hear. Her voice was the only voice heard.

When the hymns "Abide With Me," "Lead, Kindly Light," and "O Love That Wilt Not Let Me Go," were sung a few persons joined in the singing with motioning hands.

Mr. Gibson, a proofreader, founded the fraternal society because insurance companies imposed extraordinary premiums on deaf risks. Recently the honorary degree of Master of Arts was conferred on him by Gallaudet National College for the Deaf in Washington.

He died on Wednesday in St. Luke's Hospital after an operation for gallstones. Surviving are his widow, Mrs. Minnie Taylor Gibson, and a son, Donald, both of Evanston.

CHIEF JUSTICE WATSON DIES AT 78 YEARS

Was Head of Vermont Supreme Court Where He Had Served for 30 Years.

MONTPELIER, Vt., Dec. 7 (AP.).—Justice Henry Watson, 78, Chief Justice of the Vermont Supreme Court, died at his home today after an illness of several weeks.

Justice Watson had served thirty years as a Supreme Court justice and since 1917 as Chief Justice. He was born in Bradford, Vt., and while obtaining his education worked on farms of the neighborhood. He entered the law office of Orin Vambell of Bradford and was admitted to the bar in 1877. In 1886 he became Orange County Attorney and in 1892 he was elected to the State Senate.

Although his health had been failing, Justice Watson attended the last session of the Supreme Court.

Solomon Traub.

Solomon Traub, cashier of the Stock Exchange firm of Heidelbach, Ickelheimer & Co., with which he had been associated for fifty-five years, died Friday at his home, 2 West Eighty-ninth Street, aged 79. He left a daughter, Mrs. Bertha Neuberger.

John W. Stevenson.

FULTON, N. Y., Dec. 7 (AP.).—John W. Stevenson, former agent and superintendent of the Fulton plant of the American Woolen Mills, Inc., and three times Mayor of the city, died at his home here today after suffering a stroke. He was 63 years old.

Plan Paris Memorial to Herrick.

CLEVELAND, Dec. 7 (AP.).—A committee of thirty prominent Clevelanders was organized here today to arrange for the establishment of a memorial salon in the American World War Memorial Building in Paris in honor of Ambassador Myron T. Herrick. The committee will raise $30,000 for the purpose. Among those on the committee are Samuel Mather, philanthropist, and former Secretary of War Newton D. Baker.

FRANK CONNES DIES.

Supreme Court Interpreter Stricken Suddenly With Heart Disease.

Frank Connes, for many years an official Supreme Court interpreter here, died suddenly yesterday of heart disease at his home, 156 East 117th Street, at the age of 63. He performed his usual duties on Friday. Surviving are a son and two daughters. Services will be held in the Riverside Memorial Chapel, Seventy-sixth Street and Amsterdam Avenue, at 10:30 A. M. Tuesday. Burial will be in Woodlawn Cemetery.

Mr. Connes visited Russia in 1921 with a Congressional party of investigation and the following year with an American Relief Commission. He worked with the Near East Relief and with the Red Cross in Rumania. In recognition of the latter service he received the Cross of Reginia Maria from Queen Marie of Rumania.

FUZZY WOODRUFF DEAD.

Member of Atlanta Journal Staff Served on Many Papers.

ATLANTA, Dec. 7 (AP.).—L. F. (Fuzzy) Woodruff of the editorial staff of The Atlanta Journal died in a hospital here today at the age of 45.

Mr. Woodruff was born in Montgomery, Ala., where he began his newspaper career on The Advertiser staff in 1907.

Later he was with The Birmingham News, Birmingham Age-Herald, New Orleans States, Mobile Register, Chicago Examiner, Chicago Inter-Ocean, St. Louis Post-Ditpatch and other papers. He joined the staff of The Constitution here several years ago and held every editorial post on it before resigning to write on sports for The Journal.

EDWIN F. DODD DIES AT 88.

Montclair Builder's Death Leaves Only Two Men in G. A. R. Post.

MONTCLAIR, N. J., Dec. 7.—Edwin F. Dodd died early today at his home, 26 Appleton Place, at the age of 88. His death reduces the surviving members of John M. Wheeler Post, G. A. R., to two.

Mr. Dodd was born here on April 4, 1841, and when less than 20 years old became a building contractor. At the outbreak of the Civil War he enlisted in Company F, Twenty-sixth New Jersey Volunteers. After the war he resumed building operations, retiring ten years ago. A widow, a daughter and five sons survive.

Mrs. Montague Tharp.

NEWMARKET, England, Dec. 7 (AP.).—The only woman member of the famous jockey club, Mrs. Montague Tharp, died today at her home, Chippenham Hall.

Mrs. Tharp owned part of the Newmarket race course and on the death of her husband years ago the jockey club offered her membership which she accepted. She was famous as a hostess and frequently entertained King Edward at Chippenham.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 7.—George C. Coughlin, city and Southern sales agent for the Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company, with which he had been associated since 1893, died at his home in Merion today. He was a former director of the company.

John T. Ridgely.

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 7.—John T. Ridgely, Confederate veteran, who traced his lineage to Revolutionary times, died last night on his estate in Bowling Green, Howard County. He was born near there eighty-seven years ago. His extensive farm was devoted to stock raising.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

LAWRENCE GODKIN BURIED MIDST TREES

Rests in Family Burial Ground on Ancestral Farm—Church Services Here.

The funeral of Lawrence Godkin, retired lawyer, founder of the American Rights League and son of the late Edwin Lawrence Godkin, editor of The Evening Post and The Nation, was held yesterday morning at the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Ascension, Fifth Avenue and Tenth Street. Mr. Godkin died on Thursday at his home, 36 West Tenth Street.

Those at the services included Thomas Chadbourne, Oswald Garrison Villard, editor of The Nation; Rollo Ogden, editor of The New York Times; E. S. Martin, the Rev. Theodore Sedgwick, formerly of Calvary Church; Howard Elliott and a delegation from the Century Club.

Burial took place late in the afternoon in the family burial ground on Nutplains, a farm near Guilford, Conn., which had been in the family of Mr. Godkin's mother, the late Frances Elliott Foote Godkin, from Revolutionary times. His ancestor, General Andrew Ward, a friend of George Washington, lies buried there.

While the light of the sunset shone red on the snow, Mr. Godkin was laid to rest in ground shaded by pines and great oaks beside his mother, sister and brother, his father having been buried in England, where he died. The Rev. Mr. Diggs, rector of Christ Church, Guilford, conducted the commital service. Relatives at the burial included Mrs. Godkin, the widow; Mr. and Mrs. Elliott Sumner of Villanova, Pa.; Professor Harry Ward of Yale University and Mrs. Ward, Mrs. Herbert Addison Taylor and Miss Marian Hague of New York and Miss Amy Elliott of Englewood, N. J.

Leo Harry Light Buried.

Funeral services were held yesterday at the Funeral Church for Leo Harry Light, a newspaper man, who died in New York Hospital Thursday following an abdominal operation. Burial was in Kensico Cemetery.

Mr. Light, who was about 60 years old, was born in England, and worked for a number of years on The London Post. He came to the United States twenty-five years ago and was at various times on The Philadelphia North American, The Chicago Post, The Denver Rocky Mountain News and other newspapers. He had been living at the Hotel York, Thirty-sixth Street and Seventh Avenue.

Mrs. Ellen Quick.

Special to The New York Times.

ELIZABETH, N. J., Dec. 7.—Mrs. Ellen Quick, 58 years old, of 150 Elm Street, died today from pneumonia at her home shortly before her husband, John A. Quick, was removed to the St. Elizabeth Hospital in a critical condition with pneumonia.

Mrs. Quick was a lifelong resident of Elizabeth. Besides her husband she is survived by a son, four daughters, her mother, two brothers and a sister.

Michael J. McCormick.

Special to The New York Times.

ELIZABETH, N. J., Dec. 7.—Michael J. McCormick, superintendent of the Isolation Hospital of this city, died today following an illness of several weeks.

Mr. McCormick was born in Elizabeth. He had been superintendent of the hospital for the last six years. He was a member of the Elizabeth Aerie, 667, fraternal order of Eagles, and was a communicant of the Church of Blessed Sacrament.

Surviving him are two sisters, and a brother.

Other obituary notices are printed on Page 9, Section 2.

NORTHWESTERN GETS GIFT.

$1,000,000 From Deering Family Will Build New Library.

CHICAGO, Dec. 7.—Northwestern University has received $1,000,000 from the family of the late Charles Deering of Evanston. President Scott said the money would be used to erect a new library building on the Evanston campus.

Mr. Deering, onetime chairman of the board of directors of the International Harvester Company and a member of a pioneer Chicago family, during his life-time was always a friend of the university.

PLANS TO COMPLETE 5 CRUISERS IN 1933

But Secretary Adams in Report Says Three Won't Be Started Pending London Parley.

NAVY IS SHORT OF MEN

Legislation Is Asked to Solve Problems, but Morale and Efficiency Are Found High.

PROGRESS IN AIR IS TOLD

More Planes and Pilots Are In Service and New Scouting Squads Have Been Formed.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Present plans call for the completion by June, 1933, of all of the first five of the fifteen 10,000-ton cruisers authorized by Congress in February, Secretary Adams said today in his annual report.

Construction of two of the cruisers in private yards is already under way, while the budget submitted to Congress Wednesday by President Hoover provides funds also for continuing preliminary work on the other three vessels, which are to be built in government navy yards.

Under Navy Department plans, the keels of the latter three vessels will not be laid until after the London disarmament conference, although the preparation of plans for the vessels, and the construction of their armament and machinery will be pushed at once.

Congress is preparing to appropriate money for the completion of all five of the ships, but is expected to make reservations to modify the program, if that is necessary to conform to any decisions which may be reached at London limiting construction.

Modernization Nearly Complete.

The two vessels now under construction are being built by the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation at Quincy, Mass., and the New York Shipbuilding Company at Camden, N. J., and will be completed, Secretary Adams said, by Aug. 15, 1932.

Of the others, one to be built at the New York Navy Yard should be completed by November, 1932; one at the Puget Sound Navy Yard by February, 1933, and one at the Philadelphia Navy Yard by June, 1933, unless decisions of the London conference alter the plans.

The working plans for the three to be built at navy yards will be prepared by a central organization, as has been done in cruiser construction in the past. The ships will be provided with the latest type of fire control and battery for defense against attack by airplanes.

In connection with other construction work, Secretary Adams said that with the completion of work now in progress on the Pennsylvania and Arizona the modernization of ten of the thirteen pre-Jutland battleships in service will have been completed. The modernization of the remaining three, the New Mexico, Mississippi and Idaho, has been recommended by the navy but has not yet been authorized by Congress.

Reports Morale and Efficiency High.

Secretary Adams reported the morale of the navy high, the health of the personnel excellent, the condition of re-enlistments extremely satisfactory and the number of desertions comparatively small. The forces were employed during the year, he added, so as to exercise and train the units of the fleet to the highest state of efficiency and provide a nucleus for expansion in case of national emergency.

"During the past year," he continued, "the personnel situation has been adversely affected by a shortage in the number of officers and men available to meet the minimum peace-time service requirements.

"Furthermore, the contentment of the personnel and therefore its fullest efficiency, has suffered because of the situation in respect of service pay. I therefore feel that provision should be made for the appointment of the full number of midshipmen authorized by law and for an increase in the total number of officers authorized for the naval service.

"The commissioned line of the navy entered the fiscal year 1930 with 5,458 officers, forty-one less than the maximum allowed. The normal wastage during the forthcomnig fiscal year will add approximately 200 additional vacancies. Consequently, with a graduating class of about 300 and a total authorized strength of only 5,499 officers, it will not be possible to commission all of the graduates of the class of 1930 as ensigns.

Urges Changes in Law.

"This situation, namely, the enforced discharge of a portion of each graduating class, will exist each year in the future unless the law is changed in the meantime.

"The ratio of line officers to enlisted men was fixed at 4 per cent by the act of Aug. 29, 1916. That ratio no longer meets the needs of the service, and it should be increased to 6 per cent so that the enlarged officer requirements may be met.

"Additional officer strength can be built up very slowly from the Naval Academy, and while the four-appointment basis is in operation, the numbers available will lag materially behind the actual demand for officers, assuming that the number authorized is increased. The re-establishment of the five-appointment basis at the Naval Academy would not become effective until 1934 in the output of graduates.

"On such a basis, from 75 to 100 officers per year would be obtained beyond the number now in prospect. This increase is required because of the rapid developments of aviation,

Farmer and Son Are Ready To Rid Turkey of Wild Hogs

The Merchants' Association yesterday received a response from a two-man father-and-son combination in Stemmers, Md., to its request, made at the instance of the Turkish Consul here, for an American meat packing concern to apply for a concession to slaughter and market the wild hogs of Turkey. As hog flesh is generally taboo in Turkey the animals multiply rapidly. The letter, signed by Frederick Paul of Stemmers, read:

We saw a piece in The Baltimore News saying the Turkish Government is asking your association to help them get rid of wild hogs infesting the country. So my father and I have proposed to undertake such a task. Get in touch with us if you already have not any proposals that have suited you.

FREDERICK PAUL.

P. S.—We are individual, just father and son. We also will clean up the hogs in six weeks. My father is social, but when wild hogs go fooling around him he knows how to kill them. Our weapons are shotguns. His motto is, "Be prepared." I hope we can clean up the hogs for the Turks.

MACCRACKEN JOINS AIR SERVICE HERE

Former Hoover Aide Heads Board of New York, Rio and Buenos Aires Line.

WILL SEEK MAIL CONTRACT

Goodyear Zeppelin Company and Western Air Express Name Him as Special Counsel.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—William P. MacCracken Jr., former Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Aeronautics, has assumed the chairmanship of the board of the New York, Rio and Buneos Aires air transport line and the post of special counsel for both the Goodyear Zeppelin Corporation and the Western Air Express.

The New York, Rio and Buenos Aires line, backed by New York bankers and business men and by the Munson Steamship interests, is operating mail and passenger services in Argentina, Uruguay, Chile and Bolivia and is preparing to link up its South American network with New York next Spring by furnishing a seven-day flying boat service between New York and Buenos Aires.

The Goodyear Zeppelin Corporation is drafting plans for a dirigible service between the Pacific Coast and Hawaii with ships patterned after the great naval dirigibles it is building for the government.

The Western Air Express operates the aerial end of a transcontinental air-rail passenger line, with daily plane service between Kansas City and Los Angeles and also operates the Salt Lake City-Los Angeles leg of the Transcontinental Airmail System.

In making his announcement today, Mr. MacCracken said that he proposed to open a general law practice in both New York City and Washington, but he indicated that because of his great interest in aeronautics it was likely his major activities would be in air transport development.

Mr. MacCracken resigned as Assistant Secretary of Commerce after spending almost three years at the direction of President Hoover in founding and building up the aeronautics branch of the department and guiding the development of commercial aviation.

His decision to take an active hand in the development of the New York-South America service was looked upon as significant here because of President Hoover's great interest in the building up of faster methods of communication between the United States and States in Latin-America.

The appointment of Mr. MacCracken as chairman of the board of the South American line, which has been building up facilities for operation of the service to Buenos Aires for several months, is held here to put the company actively in competition with the Pan-American Airways for the South American air mail service, bids for which are soon to be opened by the Postoffice Department. An item of $1,500,000 for extension of the foreign air mail service along the east coast of South America to Buenos Aires is carried in the 1930 budget.

The Pan-American System, which will be the competitor of the New York-Buenos Aires line for the mail contract, operates through the West Indies and Central America and from the Canal Zone to Santiago, Chile, and thence to Buenos Aires over the Andes.

TO STUDY BRAIN DISEASES.

Temple University Establishes Neurological Foundation.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 7.—Establishment of the Neurological Foundation of Temple University, with a Philadelphia physician as its director, other local physicians to assist him and foreign physicians of reputation on its staff, was announced today by Dr. Charles E. Beury, president of the university.

The foundation will function under the auspices of the School of Medicine, of which Dr. William N. Parkinson is dean, and for which a new building, to cost approximately $1,500,000, is being erected near the Samaritan Hospital of Temple University.

Dr. Daniel J. McCarthy, neurologist and psychiatrist, has been appointed director of the foundation, which will conduct exhaustive research into the causes and cure of diseases of the brain and nervous system. Dr. Temple Fay, neural surgeon, and Dr. Nathaniel N. Winkelman, neural pathologist, will assist him.

CAPITAL DISCUSSES HURLEY SUCCESSOR

Abel Davis, Fred H. Phillips, Walter Cole and Albert Cox Mentioned for War Post.

NEW CHIEF FELICITATED

"Two-Gun" Copmann Volunteers to Be Secretary's Bodyguard—Governor Wires "Fellow-Miner."

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—President Hoover's elevation of Acting Secretary Patrick J. Hurley to the post of Secretary of War has started speculation over who will succeed Mr. Hurley as Assistant Secretary.

One of those mentioned is Abel Davis of Chicago, World War veteran, to whom was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross and the Distinguished Service Medal. He commanded the 132d Infantry overseas and was with the Army of Occupation in Germany.

Fred H. Phillips of Chattanooga is said to be sponsored by Senator Brookhart of Iowa, who was associated with him in training marksmen during the World War.

Another mentioned is Walter Cole of Detroit, president of the Reserve Officers of America, a banker and close friend of Colonel Hurley.

Still another is Albert Cox, a North Carolina Democrat, who commanded an artillery regiment overseas and is said to be strongly backed.

Two-Gun Would Be Bodyguard.

Thousands of telegrams and cables reached Colonel Hurley today congratulating him on his selection as Secretary. One was from Two-Gun Copmann, who offered to be a bodyguard for the Colonel. The message from Two-Gun read:

"Me and me wife extend our heartiest congratulations and best wishes on what we read in the papers. If you have to associate any with them Senators kindly give F. C. Walcott of Connecticut my regards. If you ever need a special bodyguard any time advise and I'll strap them both on."

Another picturesque salutation came from O. K. Benedict, Republican candidate for Governor of Oklahoma, who said:

71st Regiment Felicitates Hurley.

"From one coal miner to another and from corporal to Colonel, congratulations."

Some of the other communications were sent by President Arosemena of Panama, Josephus Daniels, William J. Donovan, General Roy Hoffman, ex-president of the Reserve Officers, Association; Governor Flem D. Sampson of Kentucky, Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt, Mortimer L. Schiff, Senator Capper, Major Gen. Malin Craig and Major Gen. Hanson Ely.

Congratulations were sent by the Seventy-first National Guard Regiment of New York and by military organizations in Oklahoma, Massachusetts, Maryland and other States.

Hurleys Call on Mrs. Good.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP).—Secretary Hurley laid aside the official duties of his new post today to pay his respects to the widow of his predecessor.

Accompanied by Mrs. Hurley, he went to the home of Mrs. James W. Good, widow of the late War Department head, for whom the army is still in mourning, and offered any assistance they might be able to give to Mrs. Good, who arrived in Washington this morning from the funeral in Iowa of her late husband.

WARN OF CHRISTMAS FIRES.

Underwriters Remind That Use of Inflammables Is Prohibited.

The New York Board of Fire Underwriters issued its annual warning yesterday against the use of inflammable Christmas decorations and announcing that the use of these decorations was prohibited by the board. The announcement said:

"So many disastrous fires have occurred not only in mercantile establishments, but in churches, clubs, public buildings and homes, caused by the introduction of inflammable decorations and exhibits, and the danger to life and property is so great that the practical prohibition of this class of display is deemed necessary by the New York Board of Fire Underwriters.

"Your attention is hereby respectfully called to the fact that the introduction about premises of Christmas greens, harvest specimens and other inflammable materials, such as cotton and paper scraps to represent snow and the use of motion picture machines, constitutes an additional hazard not contemplated by underwriters in issuing policies of indemnity covering the usual fire hazard. In this connection we refer you to one of the conditions of the standard form of fire insurance policy, wherein it is stipulated that:

"'Unless otherwise provided by agreement in writing added hereto this company shall not be liable for loss or damage occurring while the hazard is increased by any means within the control or knowledge of the insured.'

"We desire to call your attention to the fact that fire insurance contracts require that all additions, changes or alterations made in electrical equipments be reported to and approved by this board, and whatever other changes or additions, for temporary or permanent use are to be installed, applications for approval should be filed on blanks provided for that purpose."

Succeeds Tondorf at Georgetown.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP).—The Rev. Dr. Frederick Wyatt Sohon, S. J., has been appointed director of the Georgetown University seismological observatory, succeeding the Rev. Dr. Francis A. Tondorf, who died recently after holding that post more than a quarter of a century. Father Sohon is widely known as an astronomer and earthquake authority, and a few years ago was in charge of the seismological apparatus at Fordham University.

Parachute Jumps Have Saved 200 Fliers' Lives; Total Has Doubled Since August of Last Year

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—With the life-saving parachute jumps made last Wednesday on the outskirts of Goodwater, Ala., by Lieutenant J. M. Gillespie and Staff Sergeants Dwight M. Capps and Richard M. Bremer of the 96th Bombardment Squadron, Langley Field, Va., the number of lives saved in this country through such jumps reached 200, the War Department announced today.

Meagre reports indicate that the parachute worn by Lieutenant Ernest G. Schmidt, who was killed, fouled or that he pulled the rip cord too late.

A total of 209 emergency jumps have been made thus far.

Seven members of the Caterpillar Club have made more than one emergency jump. Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh is credited with four and Captain Frank O'D. Hunter, Lieutenant James T. Hutchison, Lieutenant E. H. Barksdale (deceased), Sergeant Fred P. Miller, Major James Rutledge and Al Wilson with two each.

It was only as far back as Aug. 3, 1928, that Flying Cadet William J. Crosswell saved his life through an emergency jump and therefore became the one-hundredth member of the Caterpillar Club. Thus, in the space of fifteen months, membership was exactly doubled, which testifies, in the opinion of the War Department, to at least two outstanding causes for the growth of this organization; namely, that flying has greatly increased during the past year and that much wider use is now being made of the parachute.

REFORMS APPROVED BY AUSTRIAN HOUSE

Chamber, Passing Constitution Bill, Cheers Schober as the Nation's Savior.

HEIMWEHR IS DISGRUNTLED

Call for Still More Bitter Fight—Chancellor Plans General Surrender of Arms.

By JOHN MacCORMAC.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

VIENNA, Dec. 7.—Five weeks of exhausting effort on the part of Chancellor Johann Schober to preserve Austria from the civil war which was threatened by the Heimwehr Fascists were brought to a successful conclusion today when his constitutional reform bill, drawn up by a compromise between the majority parties and the Social Democratic minority, was finally passed by the Chamber.

In a single day the second and third readings were rushed through the House, which subsequently rose to cheer Herr Schober as Austria's strong man who had saved the country at the most critical period of its existence.

The new bill, which the Heimwehr intended should make Austria a Fascist State with the President having many of the autocratic powers of the Hapsburgs, gradually had lopped off its dangerous provisions in protracted negotiations which occupied Herr Schober day and night and has become a simple measure for re-forming the Constitution hastily devised at the time of the revolution — incidentally, the Chancellor's success means the political eclipse of his rival, former Chancellor Dr. Ignaz Seipel, who had staked his cards on the Heimwehr, for some time to come.

In a speech after the passage of the bill Herr Schober declared that the reforms had strengthened the authority of the State, and that they were a work of peace without victors or vanquished. He hoped that Parliament could now drop violent controversies and proceed to rescue the economic situation of the country.

Despite the accomplishment of the reform of the Constitution by the Chancellor, whom they profess to support, the Heimwehr signalized the event by another violent "communiqué, calling for a still more bitter fight in the future and hinting that the politicians have failed them and that they trust in strength alone. This tone is not unexpected as it is known that Herr Schober, realizing that foreign countries are determined to refuse all loans to Austria until both the Fascist and Socialist illegal armies are completely disarmed, intends early in the new year to enforce a general surrender of arms.

SEEKS TO BROADEN SCHOOLS IN JERSEY

Elliott's Report Calls for Adaptation of Teaching to Modern Conditions.

JUNIOR COLLEGES FAVORED

$95,887,414 Spent in State in Year in Educating Total of 790,993 Pupils.

Special to The New York Times.

TRENTON, N. J., Dec. 7.—The development of initiative in children attending elementary school is one of the most important phases of educational work, Charles H. Elliott, Commissioner of Education for the State of New Jersey, said in his annual report, which was made public today.

Mr. Elliott, whose report covered the year ended June 30, combined with the statistical summaries of the State's educational program a comprehensive review of the experimental factors which are enlarging the scope of public education. The review embraced all phases of educational activity, but stressed the elementary work as "the very heart of the program."

The State is trying to eliminate standardization that has "tended to place emphasis upon the learning of facts and memorizing," while retaining "sanity" in the movement toward individualization, he said.

The development, which affects a school system that handled 790,933 students last year, is being made through experiments with "helping teachers" who visit the different districts, a painstaking program of curriculum construction and through a wide study of the pupils themselves.

Calls for Broader Program.

"The educational program must be broadened and enriched," Mr. Elliott wrote. "The great strides which we have taken in adapting modern machinery and inventions to the business of living have increased manyfold the materials and processes with which children must become familiar if they are to appreciate and interpret present-day civilization. This means that our schools must furnish many more opportunities than have been given in the past for contacts with real things.

The public schools employed 27,567 teachers last year, the commissioner said, and the total expenses of operation amounted to $95,887,414.96. The day schools enrolled 770,879 pupils, and 20,114 attended evening sessions. A total of 117,899 of these were in high schools, an increase of 6,819 over the preceding year.

The expense of operating the schools was shown to have mounted almost $20,000,000 in five years, this being reflected in teachers' salaries, the average of which rose from

HOSPITALS ADDING $50,000,000 UNITS

Program of United Fund Institutions Will Be Fully Under Way Early in 1930.

NEED OF FACILITIES TOLD

Despite Enormous Provision for Care of Sick, More Is Required, Says Henry J. Fisher.

Hospital projects involving the record expenditure of $50,000,000 recently have been completed, are now under construction or will be begun in 1930 by member institutions of the United Hospital Fund, it was announced yesterday. Nevertheless, according to Henry J. Fisher, president of the fund, the demand for hospital facilities in New York is still far greater than the supply.

"Enormous though our provision for the care of the sick actually is," Mr. Fisher said yesterday, "it falls short of requirements in certain respects. The health inventory recently made for the Welfare Council of New York City discloses that, while we now have 3,800 beds for tuberculosis patients in the vicinity of New York, this is only 37 per cent of the number we should have.

"Our hospitals provide only 725 beds for cancer patients—less than the number needed for acute cases alone. We have only half enough beds to give proper care and rest to people suffering from heart disease. For general convalescent cases we need 5,200 beds rather than the present 3,000. We face unprecedented demands upon every institution in the United Hospital Fund."

Two Huge Building Projects.

Two of the largest hospital building projects in New York are the Lenox Hill Hospital plans and the new Cornell Medical Centre project which will take in New York Hospital. The Lenox Hill Hospital, at Park Avenue from Seventy-sixth to Seventy-seventh Street, is already excavating for four main wings to cost $6,000,000.

The new Cornell Medical Centre, north of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, had $8,000,000 in resources available last March, and eventually will have total assets of more than $60,000,000. Recent gifts for the centre included two buildings at Maiden Lane and John Street, worth $2,000,000, donated by J. P. Morgan; $2,000,000 from the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial and $1,000,000 each from George F. Baker and George F. Baker Jr. Another $2,000,000 will be derived from the assets of the Lying-In Hospital, which will merge with the centre.

Another huge hospital building project is that of Flower Hospital's new Homeopathic Centre, a fifteen-story building with 300 beds, which will be the main unit of a $19,000,000 building program. The Flower Hospital plans also include a home and training school for nurses and a college for 400 students.

Other plans contemplated for the near future are the $1,600,000 twelve-story building at East 106th Street, near Fifth Avenue, which the Italian Hospital will erect; a $500,000 nurses' building for Broad Street Hospital, and a fifteen-story structure which, at a cost of $1,500,000, the New York Opthalmic Hospital will erect on East Forty-sixth Street, between First and Second Avenues.

A $1,000,000 seven-story addition to the New York Polyclinic Hospital will be erected, as will a $3,000,000 new building for the New York Infirmary for Women and Children, which will be twenty-one stories high and will be put up on the present site.

Mount Sinai Plans Alterations.

Mount Sinai Hospital is engaged in extensive alterations and improvements which will eventually include new buildings. The plans include a new building for patients able to pay moderate fees and the public ward buildings have been improved and modernized and new operating wards have been built, the improvements costing over $2,000,000.

The Bronx Hospital and Dispensary at 169th Street and Fulton Avenue has a new building costing $2,000,000 and a new $100,000 dispensary. St. John's Hospital at 480 Herkimer Street, Brooklyn, opened this year a complete new hospital. The hospital plans a new $750,000 nurses' home.

Wyckoff Heights Hospital, Brooklyn, is planning several new buildings, and shortly after the first of the year the new $750,000 dispensary of the Beth Moses Hospital in Brooklyn will be opened. The Jewish Hospital in Brooklyn now consists of six buildings, three of which have just been completed. St. Mark's Hospital, Manhattan, is constructing a ten-story building with rooms at $7 a day, including all expenses, and also has planned a nine-story nurses' home costing $425,000. The Women's Hospital has added a new one-story operating department.

FOR DEEPENING THE THAMES

Major Brown Recommends a 25-Foot Channel in Connecticut.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Major Gen. Lytle Brown, chief of army engineers, in a report today to the House Rivers and Harbors Committee, recommended modification of the existing improvement project for the Thames River in Connecticut so as to provide a channel twenty-five feet deep and 250 feet wide to the upper end of Bartlett's Crossover, and thence 200 feet wide to Allyn's Point, at an estimated cost of $169,000 with $4,300 annually for maintenance.

The project had provided for a channel twenty feet deep and 200 feet wide up to Allyn's Point, and thence eighteen feet deep to Norwich.

The chief of engineers stated that an increase in depth to twenty-five feet would enable the coal which comes from Hampton Roads to be shipped in colliers and deep draft barges at a saving of from fifteen to twenty-five cents a ton, and that these savings should in great part be passed on to the consumer.

English Cables Reach Canada Via India and Australia

MONTREAL, Dec. 7 (Canadian Press).—Cable matter addressed to Dominion points from England today went on a trip round the world before reaching its destination. Owing to the rupture of so many cables by the recent earthquake in the North Atlantic, it was found quicker to route messages over lines going via India to Australia.

From there they traveled over the Pacific cables via Bamford, Fanning Island, to Vancouver and from there over land lines to Canadian addresses.

INSURANCE HEADS TO CONVENE HERE

400 Executives to Consider Business and Welfare Problems This Week.

IMPORTANT SURVEYS READY

E. D. Duffield to Present the First Authoritative Data Linking Protection and Income.

Business, insurance and educational leaders from all parts of the United States will speak on life insurance activities and the problems of advancing the social and economic welfare of America through the application of business vision, at the annual convention of the Association of Life Insurance Presidents which will be held on Thursday and Friday at the Hotel Astor. More than 400 life insurance executives from the United States and Canada will attend.

Among those who will address the convention will be:

FREDERICK H. ECKER, president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company.
EDWARD D. DUFFIELD, president of the Prudential Insurance Company.
JOHN R. HARDIN, president of the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company.
IRENEE DU PONT, vice chairman of the board of directors of E. I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., of Wilmington, Del.
Sir THOMAS WHITE, K. C. M. G., P. C., of Toronto, former Canadian Finance Minister.
CHELLIS A. AUSTIN, president of the Equitable Trust Company of New York.
CHARLES P. COOPER, vice president of the American Telegraph and Telephone Company.
Dr. JOHN GRIER HIBBEN, president of Princeton University.
Dr. MAX MASON, president-elect of the Rockefeller Foundation.
Dr. FRANCIS DAVID FARRELL, president of the Kansas State Agricultural College.

The opening address on Thursday morning will be by Mr. Hardin, who as chairman will sound the keynote of the conference in discussing "Advancing Social and Economic Standards Through Business Vision." He will also make the annual announcements of new life insurance purchases during the year, total business in force and the total 1929 disbursements to beneficiaries and policy holders.

du Pont To Discuss Vision.

Mr. du Pont will speak on "Vision in Industry and Business" and Mr. Ecker will discuss current trends in the distribution of life insurance investment funds. His topic will be "Stabilizing Life Through Life Insurance."

The latest figures on life insurance throughout the world will be reported by George I. Cochran, president of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of Los Angeles, Cal.

Sir Thomas White will open the afternoon session with an address on "Canada and the United States, Our International Financial Relations." He will be followed by Colonel Howard P. Dunham, president of the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners, and Insurance Commissioner of Connecticut, whose topic will be "Modern Standards of Supervision."

Mr. Austin will then speak on "Broadcasting America's Banking Policy to Meet New Economic Responsibilities." Dr. Mason will close the afternoon session with a talk on "Research—The Partner of Business Foresight."

To Present Health Survey.

Opening the Friday morning session Dr. Henry W. Cook, vice president and medical director of the Northwestern National Life Insurance Company of Minneapolis, Minn., will present a survey of current health conditions in the United States as revealed by this year's mortality records of fifty-two insurance companies. This report covers the 1929 experience of these companies among more than 55,000,000 ordinary and industrial policy holders.

Mr. Duffield will then present the results of a new and original survey of life insurance holdings of Americans in relation to incomes and total estates. His report will disclose for the first time authoritative data showing the actual relationship between life insurance protection carried and the income of average American citizens.

"The Business of Living" will be Dr. Hibben's topic.

The first speaker at the closing session, on Friday afternoon, will be Dr. Farrell, who will speak on "Some Influences of the Countryside."

"Guiding Employe Thrift Plans" will be the subject of the next speaker, Mr. Cooper, whose address will be followed by a talk on "Translating Vision Into Service," by George L. Williams, chairman of the board and vice president of the Union Central Life Insurance Company of Cincinnati. Professor Solomon S. Huebner, dean of the American College of Life Underwriters and professor of insurance at the University of Pennsylvania, will be the final speaker. His topic will be "A New Vision in Salesmanship."

FLOOD OF MESSAGES HAIL BYRD AND AIDES

Congratulations From World Flashed Over Radio to Explorer After Flight.

HOOVER IN WARM TRIBUTE

The House Through Longworth Expresses Keen Admiration of Skill and Courage.

SCIENTISTS STIRRED BY FEAT

Official Bodies in England, France, Denmark and Germany Send Greeting and Praise.

Commander Byrd's epochal flight over the South Pole was hailed with amazement and delight, and the expressions of admiration that found their way to Little America by way of THE NEW YORK TIMES radio station came from all parts of the world. From the President of the United States and from Congress down to the most humble came congratulatory messages, keeping the radio operators of the Antarctic expedition busy for many days and nights.

President Hoover, in a long tribute, declared "we are proud of your courage and your leadership." The formal resolution adopted unanimously by Congress described the flight as one "marked with unerring skill and dauntless courage."

Anxiety, pride and happiness are mingled in the short message from Commander Byrd's mother—"I knew you would do it. But, oh, I am so glad it is over."

Official bodies in other countries, Great Britain, France, Denmark, Germany, sent felicitations and greetings. Men of science from all parts of the world, institutions, clubs, individuals, conveyed their tributes to the leader and the three men who flew with him, Bernt Balchen, the pilot; Harold I. June and Captain Ashley C. McKinley.

Aviators like Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh, explorers like Vilhjalmur Stefansson and Commander Fitzhugh Green, men of finance and college mates of the explorer sent greetings and expressed their homage.

The following are some of the many messages that were sent shortly after the news of the flight had been flashed across the world:

From the President of the United States—I know that I speak for the American people when I express their universal pleasure at your successful flight over the South Pole. We are proud of your courage and your leadership. We are glad of proof that the spirit of great adventure still lives. Our thoughts of appreciation include also your companions in the flight and your colleagues whose careful and devoted preparation have contributed to your great success.

From Congress, through Speaker Nicholas Longworth—The House of Representatives of the Seventy-first Congress has just passed unanimously at its first meeting the following resolution: "Resolved, by the House of Representatives, that the Speaker is requested by means of the radio to convey to Commander Richard E. Byrd and his associates the congratulations of the House on their recent successful flight over the South Pole, which was marked by such unerring skill and dauntless courage, and to express its confident hope that the further activities of the expedition under the able and brilliant leadership of Commander Byrd will greatly contribute to the world's scientific knowledge."

I take extreme pleasure both officially and personally in transmitting this resolution to you and your associates.

From Mrs. Elizabeth Byrd, Commander Byrd's Mother—I knew you would do it. But, oh, I am so glad it is over. We are celebrating. Dearest love.

From Harry Byrd, Commander Byrd's Brother—Warmest congratulations to you and your gallant men. Your achievement will rank with the great events of the world. Knew you could do it.

From Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh—Hearty congratulations to you and your companions on the great achievement and a splendid organization.

From Lord Thomson, British Secretary of State for Air—On behalf of our Council, tender hearty congratulations to yourself and companions on splendid flight over South Pole.

From Paul Claudel, French Ambassador at Washington—Following with keen interest NEW YORK TIMES narration Commander Byrd's splendid achievements. Have been deeply touched by his gesture throwing French flag over Pole. Please convey to him expression of my grateful appreciation and my admiration reflecting that of my country, where the memories of his transatlantic flight will never be forgotten.

From Captain Bruns, Secretary General Antarctic Society, Berlin—Heartiest congratulations on your successful flight to South Pole, and best wishes for further success your scientific labors.

From the Royal Danish Geographical Society—Congratulations.

From Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt of New York—I am thrilled by your latest achievement, but knew all along that you would pull it off. My congratulations to you and the whole party, in which the family joins.

From Dr. Henry Fairfield Osborn, President American Museum of Natural History—The members of the staff of the American Museum of Natural History send united congratulations to yourself and your associates upon the completion of the triumphant flight to the South Pole. From our own field [illegible] in many lands and seas we have a clear appreciation of the patient, faultless planning necessary for such monumental achievement. We hail, therefore, the perfect climax of your campaign and extol the judgment, courage and team-play that made it possible.

Your flight writes the opening page in a new history of science on the vast Antarctic Continent. We do not forget, moreover, that you and your consecrated fellow-workers are extending knowledge day by day and building, through the laborious routine of duty, the foundation for your brilliant explorations by air. You have justified the confidence of your countrymen, and to the fulfillment of all your plans our hopes are with you.

From Adolph S. Ochs, Publisher, New York Times—With all the world I rejoice in your epochal achievement. Am proud of our small part in it.

From Louis Wiley, Business Manager, New York Times—I am filled with admiration for your stupendous conquest of the South Pole. You have written an imperishable chapter in the history of the world, and the passing of time will only enhance the magnitude of your achievement. My heartiest congratulations to you and your gallant comrades.

From Harry F. Guggenheim, Ambassador to Cuba—Congratulations on another splendid achievement. Your fame stretches from Pole to Pole.

From Gilbert Hodges, Former President Advertising Club—Congratulations on your brilliant and glorious achievement. Tremendous welcome by Advertising Club awaits you upon your return July 1.

From the Explorers' Club—Your fellow-members of the Explorers' Club join in extending to you our heartiest congratulations upon your most recent successful accomplishment. This outstanding achievement will prove of inestimable value and add enormously to our knowledge of the earth's history. Those of our members familiar with work in similar regions appreciate to the fullest degree the desperate efforts put forth, and the physical strain under which you and your companions have labored to furnish this hard-won information of the earth's furthest flung barriers. May the thought of the sympathetic anxiety and interest with which your fellow-members followed your every move, and their most sincere good wishes be a partial source of gratification to you all.

GEORGE G. HEYE, President.
GEORGE F. PINDAR, Secretary.

From John D. Rockefeller Jr.—We are thrilled by your brilliant achievement, proud of the dauntless daring of yourself and your gallant men, and thank God for your safety. Affectionate greetings from the Rockefeller family.

From Commander Fitzhugh Green—Fine work. Knew you could do it. South Pole flight grand climax to your career as greatest explorer in history.

From T. Douglas Robinson, Assistant Secretary of the Navy—Well done.

From Signor Quattrini, Aviator and Explorer, Rome—My enthusiastic felicitations on your great achievement.

From Edwin A. Scott, President Canadian Club of New York, Inc.—I feel I speak for the 60,000 Canadians in New York City when I express our keenest admiration at your successful flight over the South Pole. We are all proud of you.

From Vilhjalmur Stefansson—Congratulations on your magnificent achievement.

From Naval Academy Graduates' Association of New York, from special train to Navy-Dartmouth game—Congratulations. BARNARD.

From Marcel Knecht, General Secretary, Le Matin, Paris—Enthusiastic congratulations and affectionate wishes of Le Matin, of its director, Bunau Varilla; of its staff, of Jean Sapene, Stephane Lauzanne and myself.

From Excelsior (Parisian Daily)—A Commandant Byrd felicitations enthousiastes. [To Commander Byrd our enthusiastic felicitations.]

From Charles Peterson, Treasurer, City of Chicago—Permit me to congratulate you and your courageous companions upon the wonderful feat of a successful flight across the South Pole. We are having a bit of Antarctic weather here in Chicago and can appreciate what you were up against. We will be glad when you and your men return, for we want to welcome you with open arms.

From J. Howard Wess Jr., Secretary of Air Capital Committee—Congratulations to you and your brave crew upon your successful flight across the South Pole.

From William W. Graves, Mayor of Stamford, Conn.—Stamford thrilled at success of your flight to South Pole. Stamford impatient to honor her native son in fitting manner upon his return.

From five British scientists of Cambridge University and the Scott Polar Research Institute—Scott Polar Research Institute, Cambridge, congratulates you on splendid flight to Pole.

DEBENHAM.
MILL.
PRIESTLEY.
SEWARD.
WORDIE.

From Professor E. V. McCollum, Johns Hopkins University—Hearty congratulations on your great achievement.

From J. A. Fleming, Assistant Director Department of Research and Terrestrial Magnetism, Carnegie Institute, Washington, D. C.—Please forgive delay in sending you and your men heartiest congratulations all department staff on splendid Polar flight and scientific results of expedition at base and in flights.

From Joseph Barnum, publisher Post-Standard, Syracuse—Syracuse votes 100 per cent for Byrd. Hurry home. We will mob you with affection. Compliment Owen for fine stories. Best wishes to all my friends. Hearty congratulations.

From James Wright Brown, President, Advertising Club of New York—Entire membership Advertising Club of New York join expression heartiest congratulations your marvelous achievement, also tender appreciation your scholarly story featured in TIMES. We are preparing welcome function your honor on your return in July as previously arranged. Our hearts swell with pride as we contemplate wonderful accomplishments of our honorary member and fellow countrymen. Health, happiness, success to you and associates.

From Commander Lucius C. Dunn, United States Navy—As in the good old days at Annapolis the navy cheers you with a rousing Four-N Yell for your unprecedented achievement of batting out a cold four in hitting both Poles square on the nose, and we sign off with a riproaring Siren Yell for you and every member of your great team in Little America.

From Joseph Pulitzer, St. Louis Post-Dispatch—Cordial congratulations on your wonderful achievement and on your splendid report on it. You are as good a reporter as you are an explorer. Best of luck.

From Carl F. Egge, Executive Secretary, National Air Pilots' Association, Cleveland—Congratulations all of you from all members National Air Pilots' Association. Splendid work.

From Axtel J. Byles, Tide Water Oil Company—Heartiest congratulations. Your great accomplishment has thrilled the world. We are overjoyed at your success and safe return to your base.

SWISS SCANDAL CHARGED.

School Is Alleged to Have Made Vice Easy for Brazilians.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

GENEVA, Dec. 7.—An international scandal is reported from Zurich by Swiss and Brazilian newspapers, which state that a certain large scholastic institution near Zurich sends a professor annually to Brazil in order to recruit students, chiefly from wealthy families, who, on arrival, receive full liberty without supervision and indulge freely in vice.

Dr. Alvaro Nevves, Chief of Police of Rio de Janeiro, sent a circular to the Brazilian President, also to the police chiefs of different States, exposing the affair and advising parents of the danger.

Brazilian diplomatic representatives in Switzerland are now taking measures to repatriate the youths and the Swiss Federal Political Department has opened an inquiry.

ALL SOULS' TO BUILD A COLONIAL CHURCH

New $1,250,000 Structure at 80th St. and Lexington Av. to Be Ready in Fall of 1930.

PARISH HOUSE IN GROUP

Dr. Minot Simons Says Purpose Is to Establish Neighborly Liberal Church in Growing District.

The new edifice which All Souls' Unitarian Congregation will erect at the southeast corner of Lexington Avenue and Eightieth Street will be of the Colonial style of architecture.

Some months ago the congregation, which is 110 years old, sold its property at Fourth Avenue and Twentieth Street, and the Byzantine edifice, which it had occupied for more than eighty years, will shortly be demolished to provide a site for an apartment hotel. The uptown property was purchased last Spring. The new building and site will represent an outlay of $1,250,000. The pastor of the church is the Rev. Dr. Minot Simons.

"Though planned as a neighborhood church in an apartment district of the new Manhattan, the building will give a glimpse of New England on East Eightieth Street," says an announcement made from the church yesterday. "The architect, Hobart Upjohn, has evolved a simple, dignified, Colonial type, the strength and grace of which should stand out against the surrounding tall buildings.

"With the move, All Souls' purposes to establish itself as a neighborhood church in a section of the new east side of New York, where there are but few churches of any denomination. In this part of Manhattan, which is rapidly being rebuilt with large apartment houses, a neighborly liberal church should offer a community service to the residents and their children. Its traditions agree with Dr. Robert A. Millikan, the scientist and Nobel Prize winner, who expresses the ideal of the modern church as: 'I believe that one of the greatest contributions the United States can, or ever will, make to world's progress * * * will consist in furnishing an example to the world of how the religious life of a nation can evolve intelligently, inspiringly, reverently, completely divorced from all unreason, all superstition and all unwholesome emotionalism.'

"After exhaustive study, the committee in charge decided against the incorporation of the church in an apartment skyscraper, not deeming it wise to subordinate church to apartment house architecture, nor to enter the real estate business.

"The complete plans call for a modern parish house and a chapel—all of which will cost about $1,250,000. The church building should be finished by the Fall of 1930. It will also contain a Fellowship Hall to accommodate 500 persons. This hall will have a stage equipment for the activities of the young people."

During the erection of the new edifice, Sunday morning worship is being held in the hall of the MacDowell Club, 166 East Seventy-third Street.

George F. Baker, now in his ninetieth year, has been a trustee of All Souls for forty years. Among former members were William Cullen Bryant, Peter Cooper and Joseph H. Choate.

Professor Hendel, a graduate, and formerly a member of the Princeton University faculty, will discuss "Idealism in Contemporary Life."

GROUP OF 10 TO PLAN CHARITIES MERGER

New York and Brooklyn Jewish Federations to Name Bodies Soon to Draft the Details.

DR. LOWENSTEIN EXPLAINS

Work Continues Separately Till Project Is Completed—New Queens Service May Not Be Required.

The New York Federation for the Support of Jewish Philanthropic Societies and the Brooklyn Federation of Jewish Charities, which voted recently to merge by Jan. 1, 1931, will appoint committees soon to work out the actual means and details of consolidation, Dr. Solomon Lowenstein, executive director of the New York organization, announced yesterday.

Each federation will appoint a committee of five members of its board of trustees. The gift of Ralph Jonas of $1,000,000 to a merged fund is conditioned on the amalgamation being made some time during 1930.

In the meantime, the activities of the two groups, including fund-raising efforts, will continue to be carried on separately. Before the committees make their recommendations on the actual mode of consolidation it is not possible to predict the date of the merger, Dr. Lowenstein said.

1930 Joint Campaign Unsettled.

"There has been some speculation on the possibility of the two federations conducting a joint campaign for funds in 1930," Dr. Lowenstein said. "The matter is highly problematical, as the committees which are to consider the actual steps of union have not even been appointed.

"The machinery for the merger has been set in motion in order that the Jewish community of Greater New York might view the future of its social work program from the unified standpoint of all five boroughs together. The joint committee will have before it a massive body of pertinent facts on the drift of Jewish population and on the standards and extent of service in every field of communal endeavor. When the city is looked at as a whole, it already has been indicated that in a number of ways Jewish institutions are up to the needs of the Jewish population. For example, there is a sufficient number of beds to care for children in institutions. There also is a sufficient supply of beds for the care of the aged and a sufficient number of beds in Jewish general hospitals."

New Viewpoint on Service.

Dr. Lowenstein said that the two existing federations had extended their services to the three boroughs with the greatest Jewish population, namely, Manhattan, Bronx and Brooklyn. From now on, he asserted, each community problem will have to be considered from the larger community viewpoint if adequate solution is to be arrived at.

"Definite consideration will have to be given to the situation in Queens," he said. "Certain agencies in one borough are more available to residents of a neighboring borough than another agency miles away in their own borough and it does not follow that because a given borough does not have a given service within its own borders that it is necessary to establish additional agencies. In many fields of work adequate plants and a sufficient number of agencies for serving the entire city exist, but until the committee works out its plan it is premature to predict the nature of its recommendation."

Dr. Lowenstein expressed the opinion that the proposed merger would tend to effect a better organization of Jewish social work, and that it would result not only in the ultimate development of higher standards for existing agencies but will have the effect of eliminating duplication.

AIDS SOCIAL RESEARCH.

Mrs. F. D. Roosevelt on Advisory Board of School.

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, wife of the Governor, is a member of the advisory committee of the New School for Social Research, which is engaged in financing the $500,000 building to be erected next year on the site recently purchased at 66-72 West Twelfth Street, it was announced yesterday. The new building will be opened in October, 1930.

Joseph Urban, the architect, has designed the structure, which will be the first building erected in the United States for higher adult education. Although its students represent every field of professional, commercial and cultural activity, the school requires no credits or other credentials for entrance.

SPONSOR REFORMS IN CHILD LABOR

Governors of 26 States Send Their Views to the National Committee.

LARSON APPLAUDS WORK

Roosevelt Proposes More Vital Types of Preparation in the School System.

Governors of twenty-six States joined in advocating improvement in child labor conditions in statements issued yesterday by the National Child Labor Committee in connection with its forthcoming silver anniversary, which will be observed at a two-day conference at the Hotel Roosevelt on Dec. 16 and 17 next. The Governors agreed that the child life of America must be conserved and the majority held that the progress of the nation may be measured by the attitude of its people toward the welfare of its children.

The Governors making the statements to the committee were:

BIB GRAVES, Alabama.
HARVEY PARNELL, Arkansas.
C. C. YOUNG, California.
DOYLE E. CARLTON, Florida.
H. C. BALDRIDGE, Idaho.
LOUIS L. EMMERSON, Illinois.
HOWARD G. LESLIE, Indiana.
JOHN HAMMILL, Iowa.
CLYDE M. REED, Kansas.
WILLIAM T. GARDINER, Maine.
ALBERT C. RITCHIE, Maryland.
FRANK G. ALLEN, Massachisetts.
FRED W. GREEN, Michigan.
THEODORE G. BILBO, Mississippi.
ARTHUR J. WEAVER, Nebraska.
F. B. BALZAR, Nevada.
C. W. TOBEY, New Hampshire.
MORGAN F. LARSON, New Jersey.
R. C. DILLON, New Mexico.
FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, New York.
I. L. PATTERSON, Oregon.
JOHN S. FISHER, Pennsylvania.
NORMAN S. CASE, Rhode Island.
GEORGE H. DERN, Utah.
WALTER J. KOHLER, Wisconsin.
FRANK C. EMERSON, Wyoming.

Urges Reforms in Schools.

"Newer, more vital, more significant types of preparation for satisfactory living must be evolved in our school system," said Governor Roosevelt, "so that, if we prohibit the employment of children up to 16, we may at the same time provide fruitful experiences to fill those years and turn out more valuable citizens to the State and to industry when they do enter upon their productive years."

Governor Larson pointed to legislation enacted during the twenty-five-year life of the committee as testimony of the public consciousness it had aroused. "Perhaps the greatest achievement of the committee," said Governor Ritchie, "has been the stimulation of the States to a positive philosophy toward this problem."

The necessity of taking a more positive attitude toward the child was emphasized by Governor Carlton, who wrote that "the youth of our land is the nation's greatest asset. Our youth is at once our greatest problem as well as our greatest opportunity."

Wants Conditions Improved.

"Too much stress," said Governor Gardiner, "cannot be placed on the value of bettering all conditions for our boys and girls, and especially so when the matter of health is either directly or indirectly concerned."

Governor Allen said: "The experience of Massachusetts indicates that more important than the enactment of laws is the thoroughness of their enforcement."

"At this particular time," said Governor Parnell, "there is no question confronting the people of greater importance than the child labor problem."

"Our progress as a people," said Governor Kohler, "as well as the happiness and well-being of the individuals involved, demand that normal development shall not be thwarted for the sake of immediate gain through employment of children."

Governor Weaver praised the committee for seeking the "ideal in child life" and Governor Emmerson of Illinois said: "There is no more important service than protecting by legislation the welfare of children who are employed in commercial and industrial activities."

"However beneficial may be healthful work for children," said Governor Emerson of Wyoming, "I can readily concur with the position of the National Child Labor Committee that the physical ability children may have for work and employment should not be exploited to the extent of injury of mind or body."

ORDERS RADIO BOARD TO HOLD UP PERMITS

District of Columbia Court Issues a Stay Pending the Disposal of Two Appeals.

UNIVERSAL ASKS CHANGE

Seeks Modified Permits for Boston and St. Louis Stations—Cress Wireless Applies for License.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia today issued a stay order against the Radio Commission in the appeal of the Intercity Radio Telegraph Company of Cleveland and the Wireless Telegraph and Communications Company of Chicago.

The companies applied to the commission for construction permits and licenses for stations to be located in various cities. The applications were refused and the companies filed an appeal with the court, which is pending.

The Intercity and Wireless Companies alleged that "unless restrained by an order of this court the commission will grant and issue to other applicants permits and licenses covering the available frequencies involved in these appeals, with the result that the decision of this court, if favorable to the appellants, will be ineffectual to secure the relief sought by them."

The appellants asked for "a stay order pending the determination of these appeals, prohibiting the commission from granting or issuing permits or licenses to other applicants for so many of the available frequencies requested below the number sufficient to give effect to the decision of this court if it should hold that the appellants' applications should have been granted."

In granting the stay order the Court said:

"Upon consideration thereof the Court now orders that during the pendency of these appeals or until the further orders of the court herein, no permits or licenses shall be granted or issued by the Federal Radio Commission to other applicants for so many of the available frequencies requested by appellants as to reduce the remaining number of available frequencies below the number sufficient to give effect to the decision of this court herein should it be held by the court that appellants' applications should have been granted."

The Universal Wireless Communications Company, Inc., has applied to the Radio Commission for a modification of construction permits for its stations at Boston and St. Louis, asking for daylight service in addition to present assignments and 6,000 to 9,000 kilocycles for both stations.

Press Wireless, Inc., has applied to the commission for a station license for WJK at Dedham, Mass., and WJG at Philadelphia. The Atlantic Broadcasting Corporation has applied for an experimental license for its station, W2XAN, a portable station in Livingston Township, N. J., operating on 860 kilocycles with 500 watts power.

APPROVES PRISON PLAN.

Senator Knight Denies Weakness in New Attica Institution's Walls.

ALBANY, N. Y., Dec. 7 (AP).—There is no reason for apprehension, according to State Senator John Knight, majority leader of the Senate, in regard to alleged increased cost of the State prison now under construction at Attica, which rumors declared, had been caused by the necessity of reinforcing the foundations of the walls.

"The work on the prison has been proceeding without interruption and will be continued in accordance with the plans as they had been made," said Senator Knight.

"I have conferred with Acting Governor Lehman, Superintendent of Public Works Greene, Dr. Kieb, Engineer Atchison and Architect Haugaard about the matter today, and I am satisfied there is no difference in the views of any of these gentlemen."

Before leaving for Warm Springs, Ga., Governor Roosevelt requested Acting Governor Lehman to investigate the reports about the Attica prison. The Acting Governor has not yet made public his findings.

SEEKS TO BROADEN SCHOOLS IN JERSEY

$1,785 in 1925 to $2,007 in 1929. The school properties in the State, Mr. Elliott said, now are valued at $271,225,536, an increase in holdings of almost $18,000,000 over the previous year.

Finds Helping Teachers Useful.

The use of helping teachers in elementary schools has shown its value in music instruction, the report continued, and the commissioner recommended that the use of them be extended to instruction in health education in rural districts.

"The ideal method," he said, "would be to have four or five helping teachers working directly from the State Department. These teachers could be assigned to a county for a period of a year, during which time marked progress should result."

Curriculum construction is being carried forward through development of one field each year, he continued, "by means of a committee selected from the teaching staffs of our cities and boroughs, rural schools and normal schools," with the aid of one or two helping teachers. A monograph on the teaching of nature study through the elementary grades resulted from last year's work.

One new four-year high school was approved last year, Mr. Elliott reported, and two of the five two-year high schools eliminated. Approved junior high schools, with an enrolment of 31,279, number twenty-nine.

Regional high schools, designed to serve large rural areas, which were approved by the last Legislature, are very much needed, according to Mr. Elliott, but further legislation is needed to determine the size of areas to be laid out and the location of the schools.

Wants More Junior Colleges.

A program of higher education developed from the State's point of view is necessary, the commissioner wrote, pointing out that half of the high school graduates last year planned to continue their studies. The Board of Regents has been empowered by the Legislature to survey this field, make recommendations and determine on financing.

Predicting that large numbers of junior colleges also would be formed in the near future, in accordance with the standards set by the State Board of Education, Mr. Elliott observed:

"Junior colleges properly organized and administered would perform the democratic function of making higher education available for large numbers who seek such education and are unable to obtain it under the conditions that now prevail in our large residence institutions."

More than 372,000 pupils took advantage of vocational courses offered in public schools last year, he reported, while the enrolment of pupils in continuation schools decreased slightly, "a healthy sign because it indicates that there are fewer minors of school age being employed."

GIVES PARIS SCHOLARSHIPS

New York School of Fine and Applied Art Makes Awards.

The New York School of Fine and Applied Art announced yesterday that it had awarded several scholarships for study in the Paris ateliers of the school and research work in Italy. The awards presented were:

The Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt Scholarship to Miss Stella Dauber of Brooklyn, in the Department of Costume Illustration.

The House and Garden Magazine Scholarship to Robert McClelland Schroyer of Pittsburgh, in the Department of Stage Design and Interior Decoration.

The Elsie Cobb Wilson Scholarship to Miss Edith Kemper of Cincinnati, in the Department of Interior Architecture and Decoration.

To John R. Brimer of Denver, a student in the Department of Graphic Advertising and Illustration, the Mrs. Drury McMillen Scholarship.

These students will sail late in January for the opening of the school year in Paris Feb. 17.

PLANS TO COMPLETE 5 CRUISERS IN 1933

the increased proportion of small vessels in the fleet and the introduction of new auxiliary weapons."

Aviation Incurs Man Shortage.

In addition to these recommendations, Mr. Adams made four more as follows:

"A complete revision of existing pay laws, adjustment of the act governing the promotion and distribution of officers of the line, a means for the retirement of staff officers not selected for promotion, and an increase in the enlisted personnel strength."

The enlisted strength for the fiscal year was 84,000 men and an increase of 500 was authorized for the present fiscal year, but the strength for the period covered by the report provided only 92 per cent of the men required to man the various vessels and stations.

This shortage is due in important part to the expansion of aviation, 10,771 men being needed during the fiscal year 1929 for aviation duties.

On June 30, 1929, there were 281 aircraft attached to the forces afloat, and a maximum of 419 aircraft, including those in reserve, were attached to fleet aircraft units during the year. During the present fiscal year a number of new units are being added to the aeronautical organization.

Tells of Flying Progress.

Chief among these are a six-plane patrol squadron for the battle fleet, similar ones for the scouting fleet and for Pearl Harbor, a six-plane scouting squad for the Asiatic fleet and a six-plane unit for the training of midshipmen at Annapolis.

While Secretary Adams said progress had been satisfactory on the five-year aircraft building program, he held it necessary to authorize additional planes for use on the new cruisers now being constructed or about to be laid down.

In speaking of the development of naval aviation during the year, he said:

"Not only did we have more planes and pilots in operation, but the average pilot flew about 216 hours, or about 19 per cent more than in the previous year and three times as much as seven years ago. This increased activity has also been accompanied by market increase in safety. Last year the flying hours per fatal accident increased from 7,226 the previous year to 11,288.

Reports Need of Plane Carriers.

"Rigid airship operations with the U. S. S. Los Angeles have continued throughout the year and steadily increasing progress has been made in solving the problems connected with airship handling.

"The mobile stub mast has been practically completed and a number of towing tests conducted. These indicate the ultimate feasibility of the handling scheme which is built around the mobile mast as the principal mechanical unit.

"An apparatus for attaching airplanes to airships has also been constructed and successful tests of this apparatus have been carried out.

"The addition of two new aircraft carriers, the Lexington and Saratoga, to the fleet has increased naval air operations to a marked degree. These carriers made their first cruises with the fleet during the past year, and their operations were highly successful from all standpoints.

"They proved themselves to be effective, efficient and vital units of the United States fleet. Through the advent of these carriers the fleet was able to employ aircraft on more varied surface activities than had ever been the case previously.

"There is an urgent need for additional carrier tonnage, however, to provide for the expansion of the air arm of our fleet to its proportionate relationship to the fleet as a whole. The department, therefore, recommends that immediate steps be taken to provide the parity of aircraft-carrier tonnage provided for in the Washington limitation of armaments treaty. This is the most urgent need of naval aviation at the present time."

Gifts that give Charm through the Years are Gifts worth giving and having!

This cleverly designed end-table has shelves and niches for large books and magazines. It is 25 in. high with top 11 in. by 24 in. In solid mahogany and veneer. $33.50.

One feature of this charming solid mahogany Colonial end table is its capacious rack for magazines and large folios. The top is 12 in. by 24 in. It is 25 in. high. $17.50.

IF you are thinking of gifts that will remain beneath your own rooftree—gifts from the family to the family—then think of good furniture. For a gift of good furniture is one that will be treasured for many, many years.

An upholstered easy chair for the chimney corner, a tall secretary to fill the space between windows, an intimate little coffee table or a pair of lamps for end-tables—whatever you've dreamed of giving or having in fine furniture this Christmas, you'll find it here at Flint & Horner's—and very reasonably priced!

The decorative qualities of this drum table are equalled by the usefulness of such an occasional piece. The top is 24 in. in diameter. In solid walnut and veneer. $32.50.

A useful table anywhere is this splendid 18th Century reproduction in solid mahogany, walnut or maple. It measures 30 in. by 30 in. and makes an ideal gift. $29.50.

The coffee table has a hundred hospitable uses. This fine imported model has a marble top. It measures 15 in. by 23 in. and is priced at $18.50.

The top of this distinguished Renaissance draw-top coffee table extends to 18 in. by 40 in. The table is solid walnut with beautifully turned legs. $28.

This stunning "pullabout" chair with solid mahogany arms and legs comes in a covering of taupe antique velvet or a small patterned tete de negre damask. $34.

A most desirable family gift—this English lounging chair with removable seat cushion and loose pillow back filled with down. In a selection of two excellent tapestries. $120.

From its gilded eagle to its bracket foot this secretary reproduces a fine old Colonial piece. It is 36 in. wide, of solid mahogany and veneer, $105. Also in solid maple and veneer, $112.

Don't scatter the family's gifts to the family in personal trifles—lump the little ineffectual gifts into one solid, enduring donation that will contribute pleasure and comfort for years and years.

TODAY'S PROGRAMS IN CITY'S CHURCHES

Universal Bible Sunday Will Be Noted by Most Pastors in Their Sermons.

GIFTS FOR NEEDY CHILDREN

Annual Every-Member Canvass for Pledges to Aid Budgets Will Be Started.

Today will be observed as "Universal Bible Sunday." At the request of the American Bible Society, Bible House, Astor Place, and of the New York Bible Society, 5 East Forty-eighth Street, virtually every Protestant pastor will preach a sermon today on the Bible. The American Bible Society has made public letters from President Hoover and Governor Roosevelt on the value of this annual observance. The official service in commemoration of the one hundred twentieth anniversary of the New York organization will be held this afternoon at 4 o'clock in Holy Trinity Lutheran Church, Central Park West and Sixty-fifth Street. Today is "International Golden Rule Sunday" when contributions will be received for destitute children in the Old World. The majority of the 5,497 Congregational churches in the United States will today begin their annual every-member canvass for pledges for the year's support. This is the Second Sunday in Advent.

Christmas Gifts

with the Air and Mien of Luxuries and the modest prices of Common Sense!

"Bless me, why didn't I think of hose before?"

CHRISTMAS GIFTS are these of Peck & Peck's that brilliantly combine an air of extravagance with prices that are as modest and cheering as the old-fashioned custom of Xmas caroling!

Gifts they are with an assured heritage of smartness and charm, the gifts of a shop whose gift prestige is a truth and tradition of long-standing. For a Christmas merry and a Christmas reasonable we heartily commend to your personal lists, the lovely hosiery; the sweaters, socks and neckwear, the scarfs and lounging robes and the hundred odd things of charm and service we hold for your Christmas choosing.

Small patterned golf sweaters of finest Scotch wool, in greys, blues and browns, $17.50. Golf hose to match, $6.50. Solid color cashmere sweaters, $25 and $30. Matching golf hose, $12.

Peck & Peck crew-necked and striped pull-over sweater of silk and wool to be worn tuck in or outside the skirt, $15. Double-faced scarf of silk and wool, $7.50.

Six pairs of Peck & Peck's "Princess" sheer silk stockings in an individual gift box make a royal gift for your Xmas giving, $12.

Imported lisle socks in a wealth of smart designs and patterns. Shaded textures with embroidered clocks, $3.50. Plain colors, ribbed, $2. Others in small neat patterns, $1.50 to $3.50.

Peck & Peck dressing robe of English foulard tie silk in stunning colors, and patterns as British as the Bank of England! $35. Other dressing robes up to $95.

Three pair of Peck & Peck's famous "sport stockings" in an individual box that has useful as well as decorative virtues, $9.75. Other Peck & Peck stockings attractively boxed, $6.75 to $32.50 for three pair.

"Silken Snare", the newest of net stockings, is a gift of rare loveliness. Sport jewelry also makes a splendid gift and we have a brilliant collection.

DINNER DANCE GIVEN FOR CARITA E. BIRD

Debutante Honored at Large Party in Ballroom Suite of Ritz-Carlton.

SEVERAL OTHER DEBUTS

The Misses Fox, Delano, Tuckerman, Field and Stoddard Are Entertained.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Dimon Bird introduced their daughter, Miss Carita Esther Bird, to society last night at a dinner dance held in the main ballroom suite of the Ritz-Carlton. Christmas trees hung with tinsel, blue electric lights and iridescent balloons had been placed about the foyer and on the stairway. Yellow and bronze pompom chrysanthemums decorated the ballroom, where the dinner was served at several tables under umbrella trees of chrysanthemums. The ballroom walls were festooned with green and silvered smilax and there were clusters of blue illuminated balloons suspended from walls and ceiling.

Mrs. Bird and her daughter received the guests near the entrance to the ballroom. The débutante wore a gown of white and silver embroidered with crystals and carried a muff of spray orchids.

Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. S. Hinman Bird, Mr. and Mrs. Earl D. Babst, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. John I. Topping, Mr. and Mrs. William E. FLORA DAVIS WEDS BALDWIN MAULL

Ceremony Is Held in St. Bartholomew's Chapel and Reception at Ambassador.

EMILY D. FLOYD A BRIDE

Wed to Arthur Z. Gardiner by Rev. F. Burgess at Her Mother's Home—Other Marriages.

Miss Flora Davis of Bonnie Blink, Great Neck, L. I., daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Albert Sidney Johnston Davis of Knoxville, Tenn., was married to Baldwin Maull of this city, son of the late Mr. and Mrs. Allen Maull of Lewes, Del., yesterday afternoon in the chapel of St. Bartholomew's Church. The Rev. Dr. Robert Norwood, the rector, performed the ceremony in the presence of a small gathering of relatives and friends. The chapel was decorated with cybotium ferns, palms and white chrysanthemums.

While the guests were assembling there was a program of organ music by Dr. David McK. Williams, organist of the church, who played the wedding march from "Lohengrin" as the bride entered the chapel, escorted by her half-brother, Harvey Wallace Shaffer, who gave her in marriage. She wore a medieval gown of ivory-colored satin, made with a long train, over which in graceful folds fell her veil of old Brussels point appliqué lace, caught to the coiffure with orange blossoms. The veil, a rare specimen of lace, was loaned by Mrs. Henry Phipps, an aunt of Mr. Shaffer, with whom the bride, for several years, has made her home. Her bouquet was composed of white orchids and lilies of the valley.

Mrs. F. Day Tuttle, the former Miss Lauralee Skinner, was matron of honor. She wore a princess gown of turquoise-blue satin, made quite long, and hat to correspond. Her bouquet was of Talisman roses and African daisies. Anne Stewart Shaffer, young niece of the bride, was flower girl. She wore a Kate Greenaway costume of ivory-colored velvet, with a sash of turquoise-blue velvet, and a bonnet matching her sash. She carried a Colonial bouquet of Talisman roses and African daisies. There was also a page in the bridal procession, Harvey Wallace Shaffer Jr., nephew of the bride, who wore an Oliver Twist costume of cream-colored shantung silk.

Following the ceremony there was a reception in the Louis XV ballroom and Italian Garden of the Ambassador, which were decorated with white chrysanthemums, palms and Autumn foliage.

Gardiner—Floyd.

The marriage of Miss Emily Delafield Floyd to Arthur Z. Gardiner took place yesterday afternoon in the apartment of her mother, Mrs. E. Delafield Floyd, 1,075 Park Avenue. Only near relatives and a few intimate friends were present at the ceremony performed by the Rev. Frederick Burgess, rector of the Church of St. Matthew and St. Timothy. A few extra friends were asked to the reception which followed.

The bride is the daughter of Dr. Rolfe Floyd of this city. She wore a princess gown of ivory-colored satin, the long full skirt ending in a medium length train. She wore her Grandmother Floyd's wedding veil of old point lace and carried a bouquet of lilies of the valley. Mrs. John G. MacKenty was matron of honor and the bride's only attendant. She wore a frock of purple crepe de chine made on simple lines with a hat to correspond. She carried a bouquet of various flowers.

LEAD THE FOX HUNT AFTER OUTDOOR BRIDAL

Mrs. M. W. Bulkeley and Donald G. Perkins Wed on Veranda of Bride's Home.

FAIRFIELD, Conn., Dec. 7 (AP).—On the east veranda of Peacehigh, her country home, many of her guests as well as herself being attired in fashionable hunting livery, Mrs. Margaret W. Bulkeley today became the bride of Donald C. Perkins of Westport and New York.

Mr. Perkins, master of the hounds of the Fairfield Country Hunt Club for six years, wore the black velvet cap of that office.

The ceremony was performed at 10:30 A. M., and a half hour later about fifty of the guests, with Mr. Perkins and his bride in the lead, rode to the hounds in a three-hour fox hunt. Their guests followed the progress of the hunt in automobiles, winding in and out of the snowclad hills.

Mrs. Perkins is the former wife of Houghton Bulkeley, son of a former Governor, who is connected with the Standard Statistics Company of New York.

The Rev. John J. Scott, pastor of the Greenfield Hill Congregational Church, performed the ceremony in front of a bower of cedars. On either side were old-fashioned carriage lamps. The guests were grouped on the porch and lawn.

AN ALL YEAR CHRISTMAS GIFT— THE SUNDAY EDITION OF THE NEW YORK TIMES FOR THE NEW YEAR

G. P. O.
MANDALAY
BURMA, INDIA

June 3

Dear Homer:

..... I am enclosing a draft for 150 rupees on the Imperial Bank of India — Shortly before Christmas I wish you would see to it that my Rangoon friend, and each of the others gets a year's subscription for The New York Times — Just at present I can think of nothing that I myself would rather have .....

.....What could be more ideal than a gift that will serve as a daily reminder to one's friends throughout the entire year? Surely that's better than another bit of bric-a-brac for the whatnot ....

The New York Times.

Last Summer I was traveling in Greece. We were visiting the Monastery of Megaspelion hidden in the mountains of Northern Peloponnese. The monks were displaying their priceless treasures, and a stranger quite apparently a gentleman of culture, kindly began to interpret for us first with hesitation then with growing confidence and with well-chosen words. He happened to sit next to me at dinner and we continued the conversation. He had had some lessons in English, but had never been out of Greece. His knowledge of English, he told me was based almost entirely on his constant reading of The New York Times. His uncle, a florist in New York, who has not been to Greece in many years, sends him the Sunday Times every week. This he reads through and keeps. His favorite sections are the Magazine Section and the Book Review. He spoke with particular pleasure of the wide range of articles in the Magazine and of the fact that there had even been an article on his own island of Crete in the last paper he had received. That was, I believe, an article of July 15th, occasioned by Venizelos's return to Crete.

This gentleman is a lawyer in a town in Northern Crete—not a very large town—and I felt that the sureness and essential accuracy with which he discussed the affairs of the English-speaking world was quite atribute to the organ which presents that world to him.

Sincerely yours,

(Miss) SHIRLEY SMITH.

October 29

My dear Mr. Baker:

We are receiving The New York Times which we could not have afforded but for you. Please accept our heartiest thanks. After Mrs. Lloyd and Mrs. Geddes have read this paper, it is put on the table out in front of the office and is read by the student body. Long, long after this the copies reach the cabin homes and are used to paper the walls. The older people who cannot read are made happy by having the pictures on the walls. This is the only kind of paper that one knows about or sees in the cabin homes.

We thank you again, Mr. Baker, for this kindness and thoughtfulness of those who labor in the forgotten hills.

Sincerely yours,

Virginia Bryson
(For Mrs. Lloyd)

Every one of us, perhaps, has a friend or friends so situated to whom the Sunday edition of The New York Times would come as a great boon and a great pleasure--a weekly link with home.

There are other thousands within our own borders who for many reasons need just such a gift as the Sunday edition of The New York Times with its great variety of interesting material; people who feel a need for some bond with the great outside world.

The Sunday edition of The New York Times supplies that want, providing a gift in 52 parts, each part new, interesting and welcome --for five dollars for the year.

W. F. MACLEAN, JOURNALIST, DEAD

Former Owner of The Toronto World Stricken at the Age of 75.

LEGISLATOR MANY YEARS

Dean of Canadian House of Commons at Retirement—Vigorous Debater and Writer.

TORONTO, Dec. 7 (By the Canadian Press).—William Findlay MacLean, former proprietor of The Toronto World and former dean of the House of Commons, died today at the age of 75.

Mr. MacLean had represented East York in the House from 1892 until 1904 and South York from 1908 to 1926. He was an independent Conservative.

He is survived by a son, Hugh John MacLean, and a daughter, Mrs. Harry Sifton.

When The Toronto World closed its doors in 1921 there passed from Canadian journalism perhaps its most unique daily newspaper, and when Mr. MacLean was defeated in the 1926 election the House of Commons lost its most spectacular member.

Mr. MacLean went through life propagating new policies and attacking vested interests in Parliament in his paper. He cast more fuel to the flames of controversy than any other man of his generation. He was a stanch advocate of the most complete autonomy for Canada consistent with whole-hearted cooperation with the Governor General and thought Canada should have the right to change her own Constitution, provided the rights of minorities were not disturbed. Before the war he advocated a generous contribution from Canada to the upkeep of the British Navy.

He and his father, John MacLean, drew up the first national policy, the basis of Sir John A. MacDonald's famous appeal to the people and many subsequent Conservative campaigns. He was a protectionist.

In 1914 he urged reorganization of the banking system, calling for the abolition of all bank notes and the issue of all currency by the government, an increase of $500,000,000 in the amount of money issued and the formation of a national reserve bank which would serve as a clearing house.

Many of the things he advocated in the face of ridicule came to be largely accepted during his lifetime. Thus, he was an early advocate of the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterway in cooperation with the United States.

At one time he had a dairy and stock farm of 1,200 acres. In the '90s he maintained a racing stable.

Mr. MacLean was born at Ancaster, Ont., in 1854. His parents had migrated from Rothes, Scotland. He was educated at Hamilton public and high schools and at the University of Toronto. After his graduation he was a reporter on The Toronto Globe until he launched his own newspaper.

He married in 1885 Catherine Gwinne Lewis of Toronto, who died many years ago.

MRS. IDA BROOKS HUNT, OPERETTA SINGER, DIES

Former Prima Donna Last Appeared in 'Robin Hood'—Entertainer for Soldiers in World War.

Mrs. Ida Brooks Hunt, a former prima donna in operettas and musical comedies who had a leading rôle in the original "Chocolate Soldier" production in 1909, died on Friday night at the home of her cousin, Mrs. Vincent Cairo, 354 East Eighteenth Street, Brooklyn, where funeral services will be held at o'clock this afternoon. Burial will take place in Evergreen Cemetery tomorrow morning.

Mrs. Hunt's last appearance was as Dame Durden in "Robin Hood," which opened at the Jolson Theatre last Nov. 18. The following week she suffered a paralytic stroke after a performance and was removed to her cousin's home where she died.

Mrs. Hunt served abroad during the World War as an entertainer of soldiers in Y. M. C. A. huts and also saw services in Germany with the Army of Occupation after the war. Her health became undermined through hard work and exposure and she spent several months in a French hospital. On her return to this country she rested until this year and "Robin Hood" was her first reappearance on the stage. In 1908 she was the prima donna of Victor Herbert's "Algeria" at the old Broadway Theatre.

She was the widow of Dr. G. Edwin Hunt, an Indianapolis surgeon.

COL. F. B. HAWKINS DIES.

Won Honors for Service in Philippine Campaign and World War.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—Colonel Frank B. Hawkins, U. S. A., died at Walter Reed General Hospital yesterday. Born at East Bethlehem, Pa., on July 14, 1874, he was graduated from Washington and Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, in 1896.

Colonel Hawkins was awarded a silver star citation for gallantry in action against the Spanish forces at Manila on July 31, 1898, and was cited in orders for gallantry in action in the Bois des Rappes, near Romagne, France, on Oct. 15, 1918, when directing his regiment toward its objective.

He was last stationed with the Seventy-ninth Division, Schuylkill Arsenal, Philadelphia. He is survived by his widow, Mrs. Rebecca S. Hawkins.

Edward Strich.

Special to The New York Times.

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y., Dec. 7.—Edward Strich of Liberty, a well-known commercial traveler, died suddenly in this city today while he was here to see his wife, who is ill. He was born in New York, a son of Mr. and Mrs. John Strich.

Ex-Chief of Mexican Navy a Suicide.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 7 (AP.).—Manuel E. Yzaguirra, aged 82, who lived through several seething generations of Mexican politics to become the chief of the Mexican Navy Department, shot himself through the heart here today with his service revolver. He left a note saying he felt his life because of failing health.

AVIATION DEPARTMENT FOR CITY IS PROPOSED

Queens Planning Commission to Ask Charter Change to Centralize Supervision.

The creation of a separate department to supervise aviation activities within the city will be urged by the Queens Planning Commission. J. William Magly, chairman of the commission, will appeal to the Board of Aldermen and the Board of Estimate to amend the city charter to establish such a department.

"Commercial airports are being built in all sections of the greater city," Mr. Magly said yesterday. "There is no particular city agency to supervise them. Police Commissioner Whalen has made some attempts to regulate certain phases of flying to prevent accidents, but there are many other considerations. Aviation is becoming of such great importance as to warrant special attention from the city authorities to guarantee that such projects will be operated properly and so as to insure the safety of the public."

He said that airport sites should be selected after careful investigation and not be chosen haphazardly.

"Our Planning Commission is taking this step because aviation has become one of its chief interests," said Mr. Magly. "We have locally made a survey and will make public our report, containing recommendations for airport sites in Queens, at the dinner which the commission is giving in honor of Borough President Harvey at the Hotel Pennsylvania on Dec. 17."

TWO SAIL FOR AMERICA ON PHILIPPINE MISSION

Roxas and Pedro Gil Leave With Small Hopes of Achieving Freedom for Long Time.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MANILA, Dec. 7.—Manuel Roxas, Speaker of the Philippine House, and Representative Pedro Gil, advance members of the Philippine independence mission, sailed today on the President Grant for Washington, where they will arrive on Jan. 4.

Only 1,000 people were at the pier where there was a brief demonstration before the Filipino flag. Both men stated that they would work for nothing but independence and plan to remain close to Congress.

Mr. Roxas declared there was little hope of obtaining any Filipino legislation, much less independence, despite the King amendment showing. He expressed the hope that some new autonomy be granted in the form of a Filipino Vice Governor.

At the farewell luncheon yesterday Manuel Quezon, President of the Senate, warned against optimism concerning the early granting of independence. A series of conferences during the week preceding the departure of the men revealed a sentiment against independence before a long period of adequate preparation. As a result, the mission is in a confused state, knowing that the business element prays for its defeat.

OPPOSES ABANDONING CONTROL OVER INDIANS

Cramton Attacks Wilbur Plan, Saying They Would Suffer if Entrusted to the States.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP.).—Opposition to Secretary Wilbur's views that the Indians should no longer be regarded as wards of the nation was voiced in the House today by Representative Cramton, Republican, of Michigan, who said he believed they should be looked upon both as wards and as potential citizens.

He added:

"If this means turning the responsibility of providing the funds for education and health relief of the Indians over to the several States, it means that only very limited provision for their health or education can be expected:

"If it means that such a system as was proposed last year by the Bureau of Indian Affairs is to be insisted upon, whereby the Federal Government will furnish the money and the States will spend it, we will speedily have a demoralized system with politics running riot, extravagance encouraged, and the interests of the Indians suffering accordingly."

Bans Clemenceau Medal Plan.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Dec. 7.—Because the family of the late Georges Clemenceau would certainly oppose the posthumus award of the French Military Medal to the war time premier, and knowing well his wishes in this respect, Premier Tardieu today advised Deputy Pezet that his efforts to secure this honor in memory of M. Clemenceau were futile and should be dropped.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

CREDIT MEN ACTING TO GET FULL DATA

Stock Crash Leads to Emphasis on Careful Preparation of Statements.

NO LACK OF FAITH IMPLIED

But Accountants Will Be Required to Verify Various Items in Their Audits.

Recent economic developments, principal among them the sharp break in stocks from the high levels of early September, will add considerably to the work of certified public accountants in drawing up statements for their clients showing the condition of their business at the end of the year. Particular stress is being laid on careful preparation of these statements by credit men in the textile trades, whose problem is considered the greatest because of the losses believed to have been suffered in the market break by many members of the needle industries.

In a number of other trades, and especially in the hardware and foodstuffs fields, emphasis is also being placed on the need of complete and accurate statements of the results of 1929 activities. Mere examination of the books of clients by accountants and attesting to their accuracy will not be sufficient to satisfy most credit men.

The greater care which textile credit men want taken in the preparation of financial statements for 1930 does not necessarily imply any lack of faith in the concerns that seek to buy from them, nor does it mean that credit men are "bearing down" on these concerns unfairly. It merely means, according to one of the best-known credit men in the cloth trades, that all cards must be laid on the table.

Items Must Be Checked Through.

Each financial statement rendered will not only require careful auditing of the books of the concern seeking to buy merchandise on credit, by a certified accountant, but the latter will have to be clearer in setting forth the financial position of the concern than heretofore. Agreement of the books with what the statement shows will not be enough. Important items, such as accounts receivable, must be checked through communications with those concerns, principally retailers, in whose names these accounts stand.

Another point on which considerable stress will be put by textile credit men in connection with statements submitted for 1930 is whether or not contingent liabilities exist. Among these, the credit men list such things as endorsements of notes for others, Wall Street losses (particularly in the case of businesses conducted as co-partnerships), &c. Accountants will be asked to look into these matters very carefully, particularly where there is evidence of stocks being held on margin.

Very often, it was pointed out yesterday, only the actual equity in margined stocks is indicated on the books of a co-partnership. This may appear, for example, as $2,500 or $3,000 when the actual amount involved is $10,000. The difference is a substantial item and one which credit men want to know about. Accountants will be asked to give information of this kind when it is found. Few objections are expected, as the accountant realizes that it is best for all concerned to have his client present an unimpeachable statement.

It was also brought out yesterday by the credit man previously referred to that in recent years some manufacturers of apparel have not been including in their inventories and liabilities piece goods and other merchandise purchased for the Spring season. In view of present conditions, credit men want data on this point shown in an appended record.

In Hardware and Food Lines.

Next to the textile trades, pressure on actual and prospective customers for complete credit information appears to be strongest in the hardware and food fields, but more stringent methods of credit checking are apparent in practically all industries. Concerns in many lines that heretofore have not required submission of certified statements of the year-end financial standing of their customers are now insisting on it, and it is apparently only a matter of a short time when the practice will become general. Selling houses in many lines will not open new accounts without the presentation of certified statements. Incidentally, many important producers are not opening new accounts at all at the present time.

In order to prevent irregularities by a thorough checking up of statements submitted by customers, the credit departments of a number of manufacturing and wholesale houses, as well as banks and textile factoring concerns, are now using a questionnaire drawn up by a prominent local firm of certified public accountants. Its purpose is to determine the extent of the examination and audit by the accountant whose name is shown on the statement submitted, and it is sent to him with a copy of the statement attached.

Among the more important questions asked the accountant are whether he audits the client's books monthly, whether he prepared a certified statement, whether the figures in the attached form agree with his report and whether he verified accounts receivable by direct communication. The accountant is also asked if all accounts receivable are for goods sold and delivered, if all bad accounts receivable have been written off, if all known liabilities are included in the balance sheet, if merchandise and accounts receivable are apparently being assigned as collateral for advances or loans, and if the books are maintained in good order.

Earlier Statements Asked.

Due to the situation in the apparel industries that has grown out of the upset in Wall Street, credit men for leading textile houses have asked for statements this year as of Nov. 30 instead of Dec. 31. The purpose is to get a true picture of the situation as promptly as possible, yet it is realized that there are elements in this request which put the garment manufacturers at a disadvantage.

It is admitted, for example, that Nov. 30 statements will probably not reflect a normal condition of the business as compared with those drawn up at the end of the year. For one thing, they will show higher inventories and lower accounts receivable than year-end statements. This will be due partly to requests of retailers to hold back shipments of merchandise previously bought, and also to cutting off figures relating to the disposal of season-end surpluses.

A. & P. Stores Will Be First To Reach Billion in Sales

With the completion of its fiscal year in February, the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company will be the first retail distributer to enter the $1,000,000,000 sales class. Its sales for the period will exceed $1,000,000,000, an executive of the company said yesterday.

The A. & P. stores, he added, now total somewhat over 15,000. The net profit on each dollar of sales is 2½ cents. Thirty million individual sales are made each week.

SMALLER CONCERNS HIT BY STATE TAX CHANGE

Many Complaints Voiced About Higher Levy Amendment Will Bring.

Considerable complaint was voiced during the week regarding the amendment to the New York State franchise tax law fixing a rate of 2 per cent on net profits and classing salaries as non-deductible above a total of $6,000. The committee on taxation and public revenue of the Merchants' Association is studying suggestions aimed at making the tax less burdensome for small and medium-sized corporations of the personal service type, according to G. H. McCaffrey, director of research for the association.

"This amendment, aimed originally at preventing tax evasion by firms believed to be concealing net profits by paying out heavy salaries, appears to be hitting all corporations indiscriminately," Mr. McCaffrey said. "It particularly affects small corporations, which were not the real offenders in the tax evasion.

"These firms, including advertising agencies, life insurance agencies and others which pay out a very large proportion of their gross income in salaries, are especially hit. Complaints from firms of this type indicate there is widespread dissatisfaction with the new provision.

"In one case which came to my knowledge during the week, the tax under the amendment will be 350 per cent greater than that formerly paid. Other firms of similar type will be affected likewise. The committee will endeavor to make recommendations to remedy this situation, which is believed to place an unfair levy on the smaller firms engaged in businesses, the largest factor of which is personal service, entailing major salary disbursements."

An executive of an advertising group said that in the case of one firm the tax will be $420 instead of $80. He asserted that the levy amounts to a double tax, in that the State will collect on salaries above $6,000 on which the State income tax will also be paid, in addition to the Federal income tax.

The amendment covers 1929 taxes, payable after Jan. 1. The general franchise tax was 4½ per cent, with salary payments deductible. The amendment is an alternative, selected in the discretion of the Tax Commissioner.

CAMEL'S HAIR COATS GAIN.

Have Assumed Lead in Five Cities, Clothiers' Style Report Says.

The remarkable increase in the popularity of camel's hair overcoats is commented upon in the December style report of the National Association of Retail Clothiers and Furnishers, which reached this market yesterday. Coats of camel's hair fabric, the report says, now hold first place in five leading cities, against only two cities a month ago.

"Blues and browns," the report continues, "vie for first place in suits throughout the nation. Browns are one step ahead, but show signs of slipping. Tweeds show a remarkable growth in strength in most parts. A growing tendency for the college man to wear a slightly snugger suit coat is noted in a good many sections.

"The tuxedo is showing rapid strides in practically all cities. It is being worn extensively with a white waistcoat. Gray hats have stolen a lead over tans, which were almost neck and neck a month ago. An increase in the demand for the short pointed collar, anticipated for some time, is now being realized in various sections. Shirts and shorts are still holding their lead. Cold weather curbs their demand only 10 or 15 per cent in most cities."

CONSUMERS' GROUP GROWS.

To Incorporate Club That Advises Members Through Tests.

The Consumers' Club, an organization founded by F. J. Schlink and Stuart Chase, co-authors of the book "Your Money's Worth," will be incorporated shortly as Consumers Research, Inc., Mr. Schlink announced yesterday. The club was organized in 1927 with a membership of 300, he said, and has grown steadily until it now has a roster of 2,300 consumers who subscribe to its service. Farmers represent a large part of the membership and the balance is made up of "intellectuals" interested in the club's plan of submitting all merchandise to tests, he said.

The organization's service embraces the circulation of advice on the purchase of all articles commonly used by consumers. The advice, Mr. Schlink stated, is based on reliable technical information or tests of materials.

USING XMAS BONUS TO BUILD INCENTIVE

Engineer Contends Flat Gifts Are Wasted—Best Workers Feel Slighted.

PLAN INCLUDES RATINGS

Fund First Divided Into Three Parts With Extra Payments to Those Doing the Best Work.

Modern business has come to realize the potential value of the Christmas bonus as an instrument for creating greater incentive among employes, Harry Arthur Hopf, management engineer and one-time counsel to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, told THE TIMES yesterday. As a direct result of this awakening, executives are rapidly discarding the old method of flat bonus grants and seeking plans which will pay dividends to their companies in the form of better work and greater loyalty from employes.

Although opinions in financial circles place the probable bonus totals this season at a figure considerably under the records of last year, when Wall Street alone gave employes over $100,000,000, the aggregate will reach a tremendous size. The best available Wall Street estimates place the total bonus allotment there at between $50,000,000 and $75,000,000, while industrial houses are expected to come close to last year's total.

"Hit-or-Miss" Method Useless.

Mr. Hopf, who has mapped out bonus and other compensation plans for some of the largest companies in the country, contends that a "hit-or-miss" method of giving bonuses without consideration for the varying degrees of merit shown by workers is worse than no bonus at all.

"A company planning to distribute $100,000 to its employes on a basis of a flat percentage of the recipient's annual salary might just as well throw the money away," he argued. "Those who have done exceptional work feel slighted and the others take the allowance as a matter of course.

"This practice of Christmas bonuses started with the giving of a turkey or $5 gold piece to employes, but has grown until it is now a definite problem in business management. In considering the question, the business man must aim to recognize the efforts of exceptional workers and encourage others to do better work in the coming year."

Mr. Hopf suggested that a company with money to distribute should call upon its department heads to rate their employes in five different grades, running from those who have done the best work to those found least valuable.

Might Be Inspected.

"This should be done by a fair system of scoring which can be inspected later by the individuals rated," he continued. "After the scoring has been accomplished, the fund can be divided into three parts. Taking $100,000 as the total of the fund, it could be divided to allow 20 per cent for department heads, 40 per cent for general distribution and 40 per cent to be designated as an 'incentive bonus.'

"The general bonus can be distributed to every employe, giving one or two weeks' extra salary to each one, but the incentive bonus should be allotted each department on the basis of its size.

"Assuming one department is allowed $6,000 and employs thirty workers, the department head should divide the sum into four parts, allowing 40 per cent to the six rated highest and 30, 20 and 10 per cent each to the other groups. The fifth grade, which was scored lowest, would merely receive the general bonus.

"Under such a system $2,400 would be available for distribution to the six who held the highest rating. This amount should then be divided in proportion to the annual salary of each of the six workers. For instance, if the total salaries of the six employes amounted to $9,500 a year and one earned $3,000 annually he would be entitled to thirty ninety-fifths of the $2,400.

"Department heads and branch managers would be rated by the president and paid in the same manner out of the $20,000 set aside for their bonuses."

LOSS POSSIBLE IN LEADER.

Costs on Basic Products Require Analysis Despite Sentiment.

Unless it is shown by frequent analysis to be producing a profit, or is deliberately being sold at a loss as a "leader," it is dangeraus for manufacturing concerns to continue emphasizing in their sales programs the product or line on which they have built up their business and reputation. This view was expressed yesterday by R. H. Dick, president of the Barrington Associates, Inc., of this city. He added that with the whole organization geared up to push that product or line, which is usually the case, the situation might easily become serious enough to ruin the business.

Mr. Dick further said that the fundamental fault in cases where basic products were found to be less profitable on investigation than they were thought to be, lies in an inadequate knowledge of costs. The fact that production costs of these products may be known is often a liability, he continued, as this tends to prevent questioning of their right to be featured. Featuring them without knowing what it costs to sell them is an important source of losses.

"Sentiment and company pride are also often at the bottom of such situations," Mr. Dick concluded. "These factors tend to delay a change even after the true state of affairs is realized."

Publish Survey on Leipzig Fair.

In a survey among manufacturers exhibiting at the Leipzig Trade Fair last Spring, the American Manufacturers' Export Association reports that thirty-four of the seventy-eight queried expressed favorable opinions, eight found the results unfavorable and the balance either reported indifferent success or did not reply. Among those disappointed were manufacturers of enameling equipment, fountain pens, oil burners, canvas and cotton belting and files. Some manufacturers of machine tools and metal working machinery reported little success, while others stated the results were satisfactory.

The Merchant's Point of View

THE first full week of the holiday shopping season confirmed previous indications that an early start on gift purchasing was being made by consumers. The volume of sales has started off at a high level and retailers are well satisfied. Along with this holiday business has developed quite a good deal of trade on seasonal apparel and cold weather needs. The latter has been stimulated by attractively priced offerings.

All told, retail trade entered the final month of the year at a good pace which, if maintained, should bring an increase over last year's volume. From the early evidence, November results were fair. Combined sales of the two largest mail order and chain store companies ran 19 per cent over the total for a year ago. The Woolworth chain reported an increase of 6.1 per cent, with the old stores yielding a gain of 2.33 per cent. Other results in the chain field disclosed fair gains, but usually under the former showings for the year.

In a statement that followed his report on sales, the head of one of the leading mail order organizations was frank in holding that the stock crash is affecting retail business. Luxuries and even necessaries are hit, he said, since the public is buying lower-price merchandise. His view is that demand will not be very strong for six or eight months. In that time the public will wear out many things and pay off its instalment debts.

With concentration upon selling, retail buyers have been less active in the wholesale merchandise markets. However, interest is shown in the new lines for the resorts and the Spring season. As a whole, the markets appear quite firm, with supplies in good control.

Moves at the Capital.

The opening of Congress, the President's message and the National Business Survey Conference furnished a series of important happenings during the week, all of which were scanned eagerly for their possible promise of aid against business reaction. The message of the President was accepted as helpful, though certainly timid with respect to the tariff. It is to be hoped that the present slackening in industry will not be used as a basis for justifying unwarranted duty increases in accordance with the formula that he has laid down. Worth noticing was Mr. Hoover's omission of the need for complete and accurate employment statistics, an almost paramount need if industry is to have proper guidance.

Congress immediately started upon its program for rushing through the proposed tax reduction and the legislation is promised before the holidays. The tariff outlook, according to those who are following developments closely, is for a measure with duties higher all around for agricultural products and industrial schedules left pretty much where they are.

Industrial and general business developments of the week followed along recent lines. However, there was a straightening out in the level of steel operations. The mills are striving to keep an even distribution of employment. Automobile output disclosed signs of rising and Ford announced a new minimum wage of $7 a day, carrying out his recent promise with an increase of $1. Building contract awards rose toward the end of last month and were notably higher in this territory.

Business failures last month were 2.3 per cent in number under the same month last year, but liabilities were 28 per cent higher, due to seventy-five large defaults. Of course, it is still too early for a reflection of the security collapse, but the showing so far this year has been favorable.

Committee to Do Real Work.

It was not to be expected that the conference in Washington last week of the leaders in trade, industry and transportation would bring out much in the way of business ills. While the representatives of forty different lines of activity were called upon to report conditions in their respective fields, the chief object of this and other moves at the capital was to restore business confidence and to prevent any decline which might occur from fear, uncertainty or pessimistic imagination.

The gist of these reports was therefore almost ordained to be "business is sound." And that was actually the result. Where an industrial leader could not actually see good conditions, he professed to see them "just around the corner." The reports followed more or less the formal lines fixed for year-end reviews and forecasts. The conference carried along the work started by the previous conferees with the President, who merely made public their usual estimates on future work so that the total for 1930 in building might receive wide dissemination.

The real work of the business conference will be done by the executive committee of twenty, which is to be announced this week. And its program should prove a very interesting one, since it will have a number of new and almost untried questions to study if real progress is to be made in promoting business stability. The problem of backward industries offers itself as perhaps the foremost difficulty. Perhaps a group with the authority which this committee should command may be able to formulate steps which will relieve all business of the handicaps imposed by reactionary interests. It is to be hoped, at any rate, that the committee will search out facts and discount mere views.

Advertising Has Its Chance.

While something has been said for the part that advertising can play in sustaining business progress, there seems to be some lack of ability on the part of the profession to give that faith point. So far the casual reader has come across here and there a message that sounds a confidence so complete that it fails of its purpose. Some tendency to exaggerate on the small consequences of the stock panic has also been noted. And again it may be cited that the chief point a leader in the business makes is that continuity in advertising is its chief virtue—a sort of "advertise now and you will benefit 25 years from now" argument.

All this does not quite measure up to the claims which advertising has often made for itself in the way of building present and promoting new markets. Those claims have been fully justified in many cases, though perhaps due credit has not always been accorded in the process to the producer, his product and his sales organization.

It did not take the security collapse to spread a certain amount of unrest in advertising quarters. Several vexing questions were already present, and the chief of these, perhaps, was the matter of real market and product research, which must be the foundation of effective advertising effort in place of the haphazard methods so often employed.

To put the real message of what advertising can do for preserving good business before the public what better than the facts and figures on those companies which have shoved to the front in times of depression? There have been notable instances and they prove more concisely than lighter arguments how advertising can help in adversity when, after all, it should back its claims.

Fashionists Revising Their Ideas.

A bit of caution is now observed among those who so definitely declared earlier in the season that the radical changes in women's fashions would be quickly accepted. Even an authority who not long ago stated that the new modes would be successful and, in fact, had been on the way "in" for a long time, saw fit during the week to pull in a little sail. After disclosing that sales have not been as good as expected so far this season, he attributed the decline in sales and the increase in return and alteration expenses to the mistake of trying to force changes too rapidly on consumers.

This diagnosis appears to overlook the fact that so many authorities were quite confident that the new designs would quickly find favor and that business would be increased in a very substantial way not only through the purchase of entirely new outfits but through the sale of the additional yardage and trimmings required. If the new styles had sold in satisfactory volume that would undoubtedly have been the case.

As it turns out, the safest measure of gauging so uncertain a matter as the demand for a new style continues to be close watch of actual consumer demand. So far this has proved to be a much safer method than reliance upon what stylists and so-called fashion experts are able to advise. The retailer or buyer who follows this rule can always increase his stock of the new and salable article without much loss on his older stock. Abrupt shifts are not usually experienced.

ARTIFICIAL GEMS FAVORED.

New Shop for Tecla—Crime Wave a Factor in Sales Made.

Opening of the new Tecla shop last week at 752 Fifth Avenue, in the building which replaced the Vanderbilt château, was said yesterday by President B. Blumenthal of the firm to have resulted from the rapidly increasing acceptance by wealthy persons of fine jewelry embodying artificial gems.

Necklaces of artificial pearls now run into substantial figures, Mr. Blumenthal further said, and prices as high as $6,000 or $7,000 for platinum pieces set with artificial rubies, emeralds or sapphires, in combination with diamonds, are not unusual. These prices, however, range from only 2 to 5 per cent of those for similar pieces set with genuine stones.

A great deal of copying of costly pieces for public wear is done for clients by the firm, Mr. Blumenthal added, for which the crime wave is largely responsible. In many instances, he said, the cost of the copying is no greater than that of a year's insurance against theft of the original pieces.

RETAIL BUYING IMPROVES.

Clearing House Index Stood at 77 Last Week, a Gain of 8 Points.

Retail buying, as indicated by the weekly index of the Credit Clearing House, took a sharp turn upward last week. With the average weekly inquiries on merchandise orders in the wholesale market during 1927 taken as 100, the index stood at 77. This figure compared with 69 for the previous week and 83 for the same week last year. The average order, however, declined to $262 from $289 in the week before.

Changes in recommendation during the past week were approximately 33 per cent less than those of the same week of 1928. Overbuying for the week was normal. A State by State analysis of the inquiries received showed increased activity in Florida.

STORES TO CHANGE MORE EXECUTIVES

Turnover May Gain 30 Per Cent Over Year Ago—Not Due to Retrenchment.

PRESSURE FOR RESULTS

First Floor Buyers Involved—Call for Younger Men—Value of Older Type Cited.

Many changes in retail executive and buyer personnel are scheduled between now and Feb. 1, inquiry here yesterday revealed. The increased turnover is interpreted as reflecting a "housecleaning" attitude on the part of retailers, engendered by the realization that 1930 will demand effective gearing up of executive talent to produce greater efficiency and improve the ratio of profits to operating costs. Few of the changes, it was brought out, will be of a retrenchment nature. In both the department and chain store fields the aim is to secure executives "above the average." Such men were said to be scarce.

"The number of changes among executives and buyers is likely to run about 30 per cent ahead of last year," the head of a well-known retail placement bureau said yesterday in discussing the situation. "This increase," he continued, "is not to be attributed to a letting out of men on a retrenchment policy occasioned by the stock market break. The stock market decline, of course, plays an incidental part in stressing the need for greater efficiency.

"Rather than retrenchment, the demand for retail executives of superior calibre is larger today than at any time. The problems facing department and chain stores for the new year are most complex and they demand for their successful solution talent that is more than mediocre. Many executives of the latter type who have been holding down their positions under easier conditions will be undoubtedly replaced.

Expansion Creates Demand.

"In addition, the expansion plans of many stores, involving more units, branches and departments, will create a bigger demand, putting good men at a premium. A substantial number of executive contracts will expire and switches to higher positions by men of good records are to be expected."

While 1930, with its demands for retail economy and efficiency, will cause increased scrutiny of executive payrolls, this placement authority held that the salary to be commanded by high-grade executives will be secondary to the results they can produce. Pressure for real results, it was admitted, will be correspondingly greater, with the "windy" executive no longer sure of his status.

In chain and other retail mergers the view was expressed that bankers will exert a stronger influence than has been the case during the present year. Their efforts, it was held, will perhaps result in a smaller list of executives with insistence on greater ability and placing of responsibility squarely for the performance of results.

The turnover of buyers, the inquiry of THE TIMES reporter disclosed, will be larger than last year, which was particularly noted for the many changes in ready-to-wear buyers.

"This year," one local authority said, "there will be a substantial number of changes in ready-to-wear buyers the records of whose departments do not show up well. This usually happens where there has been a marked style upheaval. Such a development occurred this Fall in the launching of the new silhouette. Paradoxically, however, I would not assign this as the major cause of the changes in buyers this year, inasmuch as most stores did well with the new styles. The ready-to-wear buyer changes, it seems to me, will be based more on the desire of retailers to obtain men or women skilled in building up volume.

First Floor Sections Affected.

"Indications are that the majority of changes will be of buyers for first floor and other departments handling such lines as jewelry, leather goods, rugs, draperies, furniture and novelty merchandise in which style plays a tremendous part. The tendency is very strong to replace so-called old line buyers with younger, more alert women or men who are quick to discern merchandise changes and to adapt themselves to improved and effective methods of sales promotion.

"Running through all of the new appointments of buyers in all departments, in fact, will be this emphasis on younger personnel. Retailing today, more than ever before in its history, demands youth, plus ability and adaptability. The opportunities for youth in the field are correspondingly bigger."

In one quarter, however, it was suggested that more than a few retailers make a serious mistake in forcing out the old-line buyer on insufficient grounds. The old-line buyer, it was pointed out, in the years of his experience has built up valuable contacts with producers and wholesalers that the store is apt to lose when a younger man replaces him. This type of buyer has been doing business with his sources for years and they usually accord him the benefit of their cooperation and facilities to an extent that is not true of the new buyer, whose job may be of short duration.

A greater stability of turnover among buyers, it was argued, would be of marked benefit to both retailer and manufacturer.

GROCERY-MEAT STORES GAIN

Increase 4 Times Faster Than Units Selling Only Groceries.

Chain grocery stores handling meats increased more than four times the rate of stores handling groceries only, according to a survey published in the current issue of Food Chain Store Merchandising. The rate of gain for the combination grocery and meat store was 78.44 per cent, while that disclosed for grocery stores was 18.22 per cent.

The survey, it is stated, substantiates views of chain executives that meat departments have become of the ustmost importance to grocery chains. The larger organizations are leading the way in adding such departments, although the smaller companies are well aware of the trend and are also increasing their meat sections to an appreciable extent.

Advocacy of Soviet Scheme Was Management Feature

Advocacy of the Russian Gosplan principles to American economic life, as urged by Stuart Chase, was a feature of the Taylor Society's program here last week, according to Associate Secretary Mason L. Merrill. Adaptation of the plan to American business, Mr. Chase pointed out, would provide for a central economic board of control at Washington and for various regional control boards. The latter's activities would be coordinated by the central board.

Under this arrangement, he added, each board would have control of the economic activities of its region, yet would be under the guidance of the central board.

INTEREST IN NEW LINES A WHOLESALE FEATURE

Resort and Spring Goods Make Headway—Record Suit Season Seen.

Retail sales appear to be maintaining their holiday pace, with weather conditions stimulating turnover, according to the résumé especially prepared for THE TIMES of the market report of the Merchandise and Research Bureau. In wholesale channels, interest in resort and Spring lines is gaining headway, with offerings of dresses viewed during the week by buyers here.

"Coat manufacturers, however," the report continues, "have few if any new Spring models to show, but expect to have a more or less representative line within a week or two. On the other hand, a comprehensive collection of ensemble suits has been developed by the majority of manufacturers, and from all indications a record suit season is anticipated. Two, three and four piece ensembles are being shown. White coats for resort wear are displayed in novelty homespuns and basket weaves, with and without fur trimmings.

"Producers of basement and low-price coats are willing to sacrifice what seasonal stocks they have remaining at liberal concessions. These comprise mostly broken assortments.

"Linen blue is proving a popular color in sports wear, both in woven and knitted fabrics. More attention than ever is accorded the one-piece dress and the three-piece suit in knitwear. A novel step-in tennis trouser dress is being shown with the trouser feature cleverly concealed by a very wide inverted pleat arrangement both at front and back.

"With a suit vogue, favor for blouses is indicated. The short overblouse is a feature, particularly in the smaller sizes. Tuck-ins are firmly established with the younger set. Satin types are sponsored for sports and afternoon.

"Underwear manufacturers are concentrating on lines to show about Jan. 1, and expect to feature entirely new types. Flares, godets and bias cuts predominate. The laces are of the Alençon type and incrustations are used mostly. The print pajama is doing well.

"New Spring printed silks have not been received with great enthusiasm by retail silk buyers up to this time. The average buyer has covered on a limited quantity for holiday selling and early January business and expects to make more extensive purchases next month. Tendencies favor small, neat designs rather than picturesque patterns.

"In infants' wear the cold snap brought requests for leather jackets and coats. Another item on which there have been many reorders is the angora beret, available in a variety of high shades."

SILK STOCKS HIT PRICES.

Record Surplus of 3½ Months' Supply Has Caused Weakness.

Although the total was anticipated in some quarters of the silk trade, a great deal of interest followed the announcement during the week that storage stocks of raw silk on hand were 76,452 bales. This proved to be the largest amount of silk on hand since the Silk Association began its monthly statistical record back in 1922. Records covering the storage stocks during the post-war deflation period of 1919-20 were not available; but it is not believed that this month's total was approached, although the quantities on hand at that time were large.

Together with the 41,000 bales in transit, the visible supply of silk here works out to 117,000 bales, or more than two months' supply. In Japan the visible supply is said to be about 1½ months, making a total of 3½ months' visible supply. This statistical position accounts for the delayed covering of raw silk by the mills and the price weakness which has extended over a period of ten weeks. Consumption this year has been running high, averaging 52,326 bales for eleven months, as against 47,817 for the same period in 1928.

Handbag Worth $7,500 Made Here.

Despite the talk of consumer economy to result from the stock market crash, completion of a handbag worth $7,500 at retail was reported during the week by a local handbag manufacturer. The bag, ordered by the wife of a Chicago millionaire, has a six-carat diamond set in its lift lock. Around the frame are set 125 baguette and 63 round diamonds, together with 97 onyx stones. The interior purse contains a platinum back mirror with diamond bar handle. The bag itself is of highest grade black antelope and is fashioned in the back-strap style.

To Revise Packages for 1930.

A general revamping of containers to make them more attractive is planned by producers of packaged items in mapping their sales campaigns for next year. The step is considered necessary to overcome increased sales resistance expected from consumers. One manufacturer of toiletries is planning to spend 18½ cents on the container for an item which will sell at retail for 50 cents.

TARIFF CHANGES.

Duty on Refined Sugar Increased by France—Mexico to Enforce New Law Jan. 1.

Following is a résumé of the week's changes in foreign tariff prepared especially for THE TIMES by the local office of the Department of Commerce:

The new Mexican import tariff published in Mexico City on Monday is effective upon goods imported beginning Jan. 1, 1930.

France has increased the duties on refined sugar and goods containing sugar, the law being retroactive to Nov. 19. The rate on refined sugar has been increased from 100 francs to 140 francs per 100 kilos net weight and on canned pineapples prepared with sugar from 150 francs to 235 francs per 100 kilos. Increases on other canned fruits are from 50 to 135 francs per 100 kilos net weight. The domestic consumption tax has been reduced from 100 francs to 85 francs per 100 kilos. Import duties on other products with high sugar content have also been increased. Goods shipped prior to Nov. 19 are not to be subject to the new rates.

The Dominican Republic Congress has enacted a measure which provides that the importation of shoes with imitation leather soles is permitted only when the imitation soles are so stamped.

In El Salvador samples of merchandise not otherwise classified, if without commercial value, and samples suitable only for demonstrating the characteristics of merchandise are free of all import duties and surcharges. Previously such samples were assessed a consolidated duty of $2.50 per 100 gross kilos when imported by freight and at a higher rate when imported by parcel post.

In Czechoslovakia the National Assembly of the republic has passed a decree extending until March 31, 1931, the old law of 1927 (which was to expire on Dec. 31, 1929) granting duty refunds on certain industrial and agricultural machinery.

A new German-Swedish commercial treaty has been signed binding present German conventional rates on grain, hogs, pork and other fresh meats, but the treaty is still subject to ratification. The commercial treaty between Germany and Sweden of May 14, 1926, was denounced by Germany in July this year in order to open the way for the establishment of a new German import quota on cattle and other tariff changes.

A recent Italian decree increased the import duties on iodine, metallic iodides and iodoform.

Distillers of alcohol in Greece will be benefited by a governmental decree providing for the importation of molasses free of import duty. The Greek Government has also concluded a new commercial agreement with France, and both governments have ratified the agreement.

Firms in New York and vicinity desiring detailed information regarding these and other changes in foreign tariffs may obtain them from the local office of the Department of Commerce, 734 Customhouse.

SCORE IMPORT PRICE DATA.

Retail Body to Investigate Claims of Treasury Department.

An investigation into statements of Treasury Department officials that the retail selling price of imported merchandise is well over 100 per cent of its landed cost in many instances is being conducted by the National Retail Dry Goods Association, it was stated yesterday. The Treasury Department claims were incorporated in a recent government publication and showed the spread between the landed cost and retail price of 103 different items purchased in New York stores. In one case the increase amounted to more than 950 per cent.

Importers in New York are indignant over the publication of the report, claiming that factors having a bearing on the price such as middlemen's profits were ignored and that the highest prices for the items were taken as the average price. Although the gross margin appears large, they claim, the net profit is no greater than on domestic merchandise.

NATION'S BUSINESS ANALYZED AS SOUND

Reports From Federal Reserve Districts Show Recessions Only in Spots.

RETAIL TRADE STIMULATED

Pre-Holiday Buying Larger Than Year Ago—Building Gains in Volume.

AUTO PLANTS MORE ACTIVE

Production of Low-Priced Models Revived—Stocks Continue to Advance.

The approach of the holiday season has invigorated retail trade and while conditions in wholesale and jobbing lines are quieter than a month ago there is no pronounced recession in business generally. Cold weather in various sections of the country has stimulated the demand for seasonal goods. Many adjustments, quite naturally, are under way in various departments of industry, but that there has been a distinct change of sentiment on the outlook for business in 1930 during the last month is now apparent.

Much credit for this improvement is given by business leaders to plans under way for industrial expansion during the new year, as revealed at the conferences called by President Hoover with key men in all lines. Lack of widespread commercial failures, the absence of serious unemployment and robust recovery in the stock market have been factors calculated to dispel the gloominess which threatened in the country as a result of the market collapse in October and November.

Reports by telegraph to THE NEW YORK TIMES from the Federal Reserve districts indicate that while spottiness prevails in some sections nevertheless conditions as a whole appear sound, retail trade is above a year ago in volume in most sections, and that construction work is going forward at rather a better pace than in November. Three or four lines report unfavorable conditions. Motor production is at a low ebb in Detroit, but plants now are taking on employes and production is forging ahead on low-priced models. Textiles continue dull, with resultant effect on New England trade.

Trade Good in the South.

Good reports of construction plans for 1930 come from many sections, particularly the Pacific Coast and the Northwest. General business conditions in the South and Southwest are reported excellent, with retail trade and bank clearings well ahead of the same time last year.

Despite the sharp contraction in pig iron production which occurred during November, there are indications that the decline in the rate of operation has been checked, and buyers appear more interested in quotations than they were a month ago. Every effort is being made to spread employment out thinly in order to keep staffs intact. Railroad buying has been on a very large scale, especially in the case of steel rails. Construction materials, too, are in active demand. Nevertheless, the industry as a whole is operating at a slower pace than at this time last year.

Car loadings for the week ended Nov. 23 were the lowest since March. Some of this decline is to be attributed to the present slack movement of grain. The loadings are thus about 7 per cent less than a year ago, but are still well ahead of the same period in 1927. Leaders of the motor industry anticipate a revival of demand after the first of the year, and forecast a 1930 production of 4,500,000 to 5,000,000 units. Because of the restart of production on low priced models it is expected that the total output for December will exceed that for November.

Effect of Stock Recovery.

The robust recovery of stocks last week has stimulated industry in many directions. It probably has had effect of importance on trade, too. There is no disposition in wholesale lines to buy far ahead; in fact, in that department dullness prevails. In any event, the time for taking inventories approaches and plans for the new year, now under consideration, are likely to be on a more elaborate scale than was deemed possible a month ago. It has been demonstrated that trade is inherently sound, and that the wave of apprehension which accompanied the market crash of a month ago, has been generally and quickly dispelled.

Corporate reports to be issued after the turn of the year are awaited with a great deal of interest. In the main they will show very wide appreciation in total net results over 1928, despite the dullness which has prevailed in the final quarter of the year. This will be more than offset by the active business and good profits accumulated in the first three quarters. There is a general feeling of optimism in business toward 1930 and doubtless some of the irregularities which now appear will be entirely ironed out as the Spring approaches.

RETAIL TRADE HERE GAINS.

Wholesale Lines Dull in Last Week —Big Building Program.

Cold weather and Christmas buying brought moderate improvement to retail trade in New York last week, as well as in the same period week. The volume was considerably ahead of the previous week, as well as in the same period last year. Wholesale and jobbing lines, however, are dull for the season of the year and considerable caution has developed in new commitments. Automobile sales are especially light. According to several reports from business lines, medium-priced and low-priced merchandise is moving much better than that of high-priced goods.

Construction work is between seasons and has been hampered to some extent by the cold weather and the attendant difficulty of moving materials. Plans are under way, however, for a vast amount of new work in the metropolitan district during the next few months, a condition encouraged by the ease which has de-

Big Day in First Trading On a Saturday Since Oct. 26

Yesterday was the first Saturday since Oct. 26 on which dealings took place on the New York Stock Exchange. On all intervening Saturdays the Exchange was closed to give members an opportunity to catch up with clerical work. Yesterday's market was strong throughout, with only a few declines here and there, and with an 11-point gain by United States Steel common the outstanding feature.

Other large gains were established by Westinghouse Electric, United States Industrial Alcohol, Republic Iron and Steel, Montgomery Ward, International Telephone and Telegraph, American and Foreign Power and Allied Chemical and Dye. Sales were 3,002,560 shares, compared with 2,087,660 on Oct. 26.

By a coincidence, trading on the same Saturday a year ago established a record for the short period, with dealings in 3,749,800 shares.

$10,000,000 BONUS BY HARRIMAN BANK

Directors Announce Dividend in Stock to Holders, One Share for Each Three Held.

FROM UNDIVIDED PROFITS

Approval of Share Holders to Be Asked at Annual Meeting Next Month.

The Harriman National Bank and Trust Company announced yesterday a Christmas present to shareholders of $10,000,000, to take the form of a stock dividend of 33 1-3 per cent, payable from undivided profits.

The announcement was made through advertisements in the evening newspapers yesterday headed "Merry Christmas" and stating that in declaring the dividend the bank makes "cordial acknowledgment to its stockholders of their loyal support, and at the same time expresses appreciation of the confidence reposed in it by its depositors."

The action, the bank's statement continued, "indicates its unbounded confidence in the business future of the country." In conclusion the bank extended the compliments of the season to all.

The decision, involving 5,000 shares, was taken by the directors at a meeting on Thursday, although it was announced only yesterday. The extra stock will be distributed pro rata to stockholders at the rate of one new share for each three of old. The proposal will be voted on by stockholders at the annual meeting on Jan. 14.

Completion of the deal will leave the bank with capital of $2,000,000, surplus of $2,000,000 and undivided profits of about $1,000,000. Automatically the capital stock of the bank's subsidiary, the Harriman Securities Corporation, will be increased proportionately to the benefit of its shareholders, since each share of the bank's stock carries a beneficial interest in the corporation and its earnings.

The statement of the Harriman National Bank and Trust Company as of Oct. 4 last, showed capital of $1,500,000, surplus and undivided profits of $2,822,235, deposits of $43,718,649 and total resources of $53,031,695. On Feb. 4 of this year the bank increased its capital from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000.

While an unusual number of extra dividends and special disbursements has been announced in the last few weeks, this was the first case of the kind by a prominent New York bank for the present season and the first distribution by any institution in the form of a Christmas present.

Several large banking institutions had planned capital changes, involving valuable rights to stockholders, for the turn of the year, prior to the recent decline in security prices. It is regarded as not unlikely, however, in view of losses sustained by many investors and the comparatively low prices to which many bank stocks have sunk, that some of these plans may be postponed or abandoned.

Exchange Seat Sale at $400,000.

Arrangements have been made for the sale of a seat on the New York Stock Exchange for $400,000 ex rights, it was announced yesterday. This is an increase of $25,000 over the last previous sale, and shows an increase of $50,000 in the price of seats from the low after the October-November break in the market.

RAILWAY MERGERS TO THE FORE AGAIN

Events in Washington and New England Indicate Moves for Consolidations.

FIVE TRUNK LINES FORECAST

I. C. C.'s Plan for the East Is Awaited—Pennroad Becomes an Increasing Factor.

Developments in Washington and in New England last week called the attention of railroad men again to the problems of railroad consolidation, particularly the formation of trunk line systems in the East. In the national capital there was President Hoover's reference to the problem in his message to Congress, followed by an announcement of the Interstate Commerce Commission that it soon would present to that body its own plan for mergers of the country's carriers. From New England came confirmation of reports that the Pennroad Corporation had acquired an important interest in the Boston & Maine, and it then became known that the same corporation had bought into the New York, New Haven & Hartford. Simultaneously P. E. Crowley, president of the New York Central, announced in Boston that his road intended to retain its control of the Boston & Albany.

It was learned here that the Pennroad Corporation had made purchases of New Haven stock at a cost of more than $20,000,000, and that the stock thus purchased, together with a block which long was held by the Pennsylvania Railroad, gives about 15 per cent interest in the New England road. Thomas Nelson Perkins, acting president of the Boston & Maine, estimated that Pennroad held from 15 to 20 per cent of the voting preferred stock of his road. This, with the holdings of the New Haven in that road, carry control.

Plans for New England.

More than a year ago, Daniel Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio, told the New England Council that the trunk lines had agreed that the railroads in New England should be consolidated, with the possible exception of the Boston & Albany. More recently L. F. Loree announced a plan for uniting shorter Eastern lines into a belt-line covering the entire Northeastern seaboard, but this at no time found favor with other railroad heads in the East.

It is expected that the Interstate Commerce Commission's plan for consolidation in the East will favor the creation of five trunk lines instead of four, although the Baltimore & Ohio and the Chesapeake & Ohio have based their plans of mergers on the four-system theory, to which the New York Central has shown a friendly neutrality. The Wabash, however, has filed a petition for a fifth trunk line.

Mr. Loree proposed a fifth trunk line some years ago. For this purpose he acquired control of the Wabash and the Lehigh Valley and attempted to arrange a connection for his Delaware & Hudson with his proposed system, either by obtaining trackage rights over the Pennsylvania or by leasing the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburgh. His aim was defeated by the united stand of the New York Central, the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore & Ohio and the Chesapeake & Ohio. This year the fifth trunk-line plan was revived by the Wabash, which is controlled by the Pennsylvania, but, according to its chairman, William H. Williams, the Wabash had this plan in mind before the control was effected.

Proposals in Conflict.

The Wabash's plan would link that road with the Western Maryland, the Wheeling & Lake Erie and the Pittsburgh & West Virginia. The Wabash and the Western Maryland, however, are desired by the Baltimore & Ohio, the Wheeling and the Pittsburgh & West Virginia by the Chesapeake & Ohio. It is therefore obvious that the creation of a fifth trunk system would nullify their plans. Neither the Baltimore & Ohio nor the Chesapeake & Ohio has asked for the Lehigh Valley, which has long been desired by the New York Central. In its plan the Wabash suggested that the Lehigh Valley might be included in a sixth system.

It also was reported in Washington that the commission might favor merging the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific but would suggest placing the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, which is controlled by both roads, in another system. An application for permission to merge all three lines has been before the commission for some years.

If, as was reported, the commission should favor the linking of the New England roads into five or six systems, the present plans of the Eastern trunk lines would be due for modification. These roads have agreed upon a merger of the New England lines into a single system, with the exception of the Boston & Albany, which is controlled by the

EASY RATES LIKELY FOR HOLIDAY FUNDS

Indications Are Money Will Not Go Near 12%, Reached on Call About a Year Ago.

CURRENCY DEMANDS GROW

Reductions in Brokers' Loans Allow Bankers to Pay Debts to Reserve Bank.

The holiday movements of funds, particularly the increased currency demand incident to Christmas shopping and year-end gifts and bonuses, normally bring about an acute tightening of the credit structure in this market. Last year call money rose to 12 per cent in December, the highest figure reached in 1928. The relaxation in credit has been so great during the last few weeks, however, that bankers look for only a negligible tightening of money rates over the year-end.

That the money market can escape without showing some signs of the developments incident to the holiday season is not expected, however. Bankers look for principally a wide expansion of discounting throughout the Federal Reserve System, particularly in New York. It is regarded as likely, too, that the Federal Reserve Bank will add materially to its portfolio.

Increased currency demands at this time of year aggregate between $200,000,000 and $250,000,000 and commence to be felt early in December. Already the requirements of Christmas shoppers for an enlarged supply of pocket money have been reflected in the tightening of Federal funds. These were available recently as low as 1½ per cent, but in the last few days they have firmed up to the level of the rediscount rate, 4½ per cent. At this price they are at a normal figure.

As a result of the heavy liquidation of brokers' loans, amounting, according to last week's figures, to more than 50 per cent from the high for the year, member banks in New York City were enabled in November to pay off nearly all of their indebtedness to the Reserve Bank and to hold reserves well in excess of their requirements. These they have sold on a day-to-day basis to other banks of the Reserve System in districts where discounting was higher, the funds so disposed of being quoted as Federal funds. It is in part due to such transactions that reserves of the New York member banks have been brought down to more normal levels, with a consequent stiffening of the rate on Federal funds.

Member banks in this district, despite some slight increases in discounting in the last two weeks, are still only moderately indebted to the bank of issue, and the banks of New York City, according to the latest statement of their condition, were borrowing only $34,000,000 from the big bank. For the most part, the larger banks of the city are entirely "out" of the Reserve.

The expectation among bankers is that from now until the end of the year most of these institutions will be forced to discount and a sharp rise in borrowings from the central bank is looked for.

At present the distribution of discounting is unequal. Member banks in the New York district, which should normally show about one-third of all discounts, are borrowing only $130,361,000, while discounts for the entire system total $872,310,000. This condition is a part of the inequality of credit distribution left in the wake of the stock market liquidation. While money rates in the New York market are extremely easy, out-of-town districts have as yet experienced little relaxation.

It is the opinion of economists that the credit situation as regards the country as a whole would be improved if a higher proportion of discounting could be lodged in this district, with a consequent reduction in other districts. As a result of the general shifting entailed in meeting the holiday expansion of currency needs, a step toward this readjustment may be accomplished, bankers have suggested. That is, some of the funds taken from New York at this time may be employed to reduce discounts out of town, leaving the banks in this district with a somewhat higher volume proportionate to the total.

RECORD IN EXPANSION BY STOCK EXCHANGE

Year's Additions Give Members 1,561 Branches in 418 Cities Here and 5 Foreign Countries.

NEW QUOTATION SYSTEM

Phone Calls on Brokers' Private Wires Average 1,800,000 Daily in Five-Hour Trading Day.

Stock Exchange expansion, both as to facilities and public participation as shown by public interest, has been wider in the last twelve months than in any similar period in the history of the New York Stock Exchange, according to the organization's Year Book, just published. New records for increases in branch offices of member firms, for ticker installations, for visitors to the Exchange, for requests from the public for exchange literature and for cities in which exchange facilities have been established were all set up from Oct. 1, 1928, to Oct. 1, 1929, the period covered by the new publication prepared by the Exchange's committee of publicity.

At the end of the year covered by the new Year Book, members of the New York Stock Exchange had 1,561 branch offices in 418 cities in forty-four States and territories, five foreign countries and aboard three transatlantic liners. This is an increase of 369 in the year and brings the number to nearly twice that established by Oct. 1, 1926. Offices were established during the year in seventy-one cities that never had New York Stock Exchange trading facilities before, while Arizona and Vermont entered the list of States in which branch offices were established. One office was opened in Germany, adding a new foreign country to the list having an office of a member of the New York Stock Exchange, and the three transatlantic liner offices established precedents in trading.

New York Leads all States.

New York still leads the States with the most offices and cities, although increases of that kind during the year in the Empire State were fewer than in numerous other places. New York has 435 branch offices in forty-nine cities, an increase from 1928 of five offices and ten cities. California, Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Washington and West Virginia all acquired a greater increase in branch offices during the year than New York, but none approached it in numbers. Pennsylvania holds second place, with 168 branch offices in forty-three separate cities.

This expansion in the trading facilities of the Exchange showed a prompt reflection in the widening of public interest in operations of the stock market. More than 800,000 pieces of literature dealing with various facilities and activities of the Exchange were mailed out by the committee on publicity between Oct. 1, 1928, and Oct. 2, 1929, in response to requests received. Data regarding this activity prior to a year ago are given as covering the seventeen months ended Oct. 1, 1928, during which time the requests for literature resulted in the mailing out of 750,000 pieces of literature, an average of 44,117 a month, compared with an average of 66,667 pieces a month for the year just closed.

For the twelve months covered by the Year Book the total number of visitors to the galleries of the Exchange was 116,618, compared with 50,219 in the 1927-28 year. Gallery visitors are always regarded as a barometer of public interest in operations of the Exchange, as visitors are admitted only on the request of a member of an Exchange firm or a New York banking institution. This restriction assures that each visitor has a definite object in his visit.

The statistics disclose also that institutions displayed an increasing interest in operations of the Exchange. The number of groups admitted to

TRUSTS INVESTING IN OTHER TRUSTS

Wall Street Hears Many Such Transactions Are Made—Total Holdings Large.

VIEWS OF PRACTICE DIFFER

Policy Regarded as Evidence of Faith of Executives in Their Own Line of Business.

The offer made last week by the Interstate Equities Corporation to exchange part of its stock for a block of 100,000 shares of the Petroleum Corporation of America, these to be held as an investment, was regarded by investment trust executives as an illustration of a general trend in their field. While few announcements of similar operations have been made, Wall Street has heard of a large number of commitments made by one investment trust in the shares of other trusts. Not all the transactions were so large as that proposed by Interstate Equities, but the total amount of these investments is reported to run into large figures.

The fact that investment trusts are making extensive purchases of each other's issues is held to indicate that their executives have confidence in the basic soundness of the investment trust movement. While similar purchases were made before the recent stock market slump, the tendency has been intensified in the last month. During the reaction, most investment trust issues were reported to have declined several points below their actual liquidating value. Bankers expressed the opinion that the prices had fallen because many investment trust issues were unseasoned and had been poorly digested.

Stocks Rallying Slowly.

During the last month investment trust issues have rallied relatively little, while securities of many other types have advanced 20 to 100 per cent from their low prices. It is a curious anomaly, investment trust executives say, that although many trusts own large blocks of "blue chip" issues which have advanced 10 to 90 points in the last month, the trust issues themselves in most cases have failed to reflect the increased value of their holdings.

Investment trust executives are reported therefore to be buying the stocks of other trusts on the ground that these shares present favorable opportunities. In purchasing an investment trust issue which is selling at two-thirds or three-quarters of its actual book value, it is pointed out, the buyer is obtaining a diversified list of stocks at a discount of 25 to 33 1-3 per cent.

The present situation, bankers say, is the opposite to that which prevailed before the market's slump. At that time many investment trust stocks were selling at two to three times their actual book value, owing to a tremendous speculative demand. Today, with trust issues selling at a discount, the speculating public is said to be decidely apathetic to these shares and the turnover is relatively small. A large investment demand for these issues, however, has sprung up, and this is said to be revealed by the records of several trusts which show that the number of stockholders has almost doubled in recent months.

Policy Approved Now.

While normally the purchasing of one investment trust's stock by another is not approved, owing to the duplication of management costs, in the present instance most trust executives believe the practice is thoroughly sound, owing to relatively low prices at which the trust issues are selling. Dozens of statements released within the last fortnight by trusts have shown that there is scarcely a single investment organization whose stock is selling at a figure above its liquidating value.

While some of the investments made by one trust in the stock of another have taken place in the open market, in other instances purchases have been made privately of treasury stock or of support stock which was purchased by a trust during the recent decline. One large trust, however, has taken the position that it is unwilling to make private sales of large blocks of its issues to another trust on the ground that it would be giving a competitor an opportunity to share in its profits and would in effect be lending its management to a rival. This trust is reported to have turned down several bids for blocks of its stock, asserting that it preferred to see its shares find their way into the hands of small investors. Other trusts, however, have welcomed recent opportunities to dispose of large amounts of stock which has been acquired during the decline.

The fact that several trusts acquired their own shares during the October and November bear market was revealed in recent financial

Irving Trust Head Apologizes For Noise in Building Work

H. E. Ward, president of the Irving Trust Company, has mailed 550 engraved letters to occupants of offices in the neighborhood of the trust company's new building at 1 Wall Street, where riveting operations are about to begin, apologizing for the din which will be caused by the erection of the fifty-story structure.

"May we hope that you will bear with us as patiently as possible during the unavoidable noisy weeks that lie just ahead," Mr. Ward's communication says. "Keenly regretting the necessity for it, we are glad to tell you that our builder is pressing at top speed. His schedule and the present season of closed windows will at least minimize your discomfort."

MELLON REGARDED AS BOND PROPHET

3⅛% Figure on Forthcoming Treasury Issue Said to Show Improvement in Market.

HEAVY DEMAND EXPECTED

Bids Just Above 3% on Non-Interest Bearing Bills Considered Likely.

One of the strongest indications of definite improvement in the bond market and of the outlook for the future, according to bond dealers, was the decision of Secretary Mellon to place a 3⅛ per cent rate on the forthcoming issue of $325,000,000 of nine-month treasury certificates. This announcement, made on Friday, followed more than a fortnight of steadily advancing prices in United States Government bonds.

Bankers say there have been few occasions in his tenure of office when Mr. Mellon has missed the mark by more than a hair's breadth in interpreting the current and future markets for bonds in the naming of the interest rates on the various offerings by the treasury. They have no doubt that the offering will be heavily oversubscribed, as they find that there is an acute shortage of short-term offerings of tax-exempt bonds in the market at present.

Bankers throughout the country will have an additional opportunity to express their views on the market in bidding for the issue of $100,000,000 non-interest bearing treasury bills which will be offered. Bids on these bills, which must be in by Dec. 10, may be for less than par. It is expected that the tenders will average slightly above a 3 per cent basis.

Treasury obligations now outstanding and which will mature in ninety days are quoted at a price to yield slightly less than 3 per cent, while bankers' acceptances due in ninety days are selling on a 4 per cent basis, which is equivalent to about 3½ per cent on a tax-exempt security. This difference between the current market for acceptances and the market for the ninety-day treasury obligations is said to be explained in part by the fact that the market for the latter is far more liquid.

The offering of 3⅛ per cent certificates contrasts sharply with the 5¼ per cent rate on the government financing last June, when money rates were at a peak. The current rate is the lowest since Sept. 15, 1927. New York State bonds, which usually command the top price in the municipal market, were quoted then at prices to yield 3.78 per cent, compared with about 4 per cent at present. New York City bonds, which were quoted at 3.98 per cent in September, 1928, are selling now at slightly above 4.26 per cent. The average price for twenty high-grade municipal bonds in September, 1927, was about 4.02 per cent, against 4.29 per cent now.

Thus municipals are now selling about 27 points in yield basis above the levels of 1927, which is equivalent to about 5 points in price on a forty-year 4½ per cent bond. About the same difference is shown in that period of time in THE NEW YORK TIMES averages of forty corporation bonds.

The inference drawn from this is that since the United States Government's terms always have been taken as the weather vane for interest rates and bond prices, the current terms of the government's financing may be regarded as establishing the attractiveness of the general bond market prices at the present time.

The response to the announcement of the terms of the new financing was the establishment of new highs for the year by seven of the active liberty loan and treasury issues, thus diminishing the spread between the yields on these issues which run for longer terms, and the yields on the forthcoming issues.

CONSERVATION OF OIL REGARDED AS NEARER

Petroleum Institute Expected to Take Action Later for New Cooperation.

CURB ON GASOLINE IN VIEW

Consideration of Control of Refinery Operations Believed to Be Next Move.

DUTCH INVASION RESENTED

Executives of American Companies Skeptical of Early Agreement With Foreign Concerns.

Although skeptical of the plan of Sir Henri Deterding, managing director of the Royal Dutch-Shell companies, for an international "association of cooperation," executives of oil companies who have just returned from the annual meeting of the American Petroleum Institute in Chicago were of the opinion yesterday that the movement to conserve oil resources had been furthered by developments at the convention.

Leaders of the oil industry in the United States, it was indicated, do not see eye to eye with Sir Henri on many questions. The fact that the Institute failed to go on record as approving or disapproving his suggestions was cited, however, to show that the question is left open. Any new effort to bring about a concerted program of restriction, either on the basis of Sir Henri's proposal or of other ideas that American oil interests may have in mind, would in all probability be initiated at later conferences, it was said.

Effects of Rivalry Evident.

The Royal Dutch interests are not at the present time on particularly good terms with some of the larger oil groups in the United States, and this feeling was reflected in the lack of enthusiasm with which Sir Henri's remarks were received in Chicago. The basis for this thinly disguised hostility is believed to have been laid last Summer when influential oil interests in the United States moved to have the basic export price of gasoline further reduced. That tendency was resisted by the Royal Dutch and other European oil interests because of the fear that the oil markets of Europe would be dislocated.

There have been indications recently that some satisfactory agreement on this question was near, but some of the important exporting interests in this country are said to be still unwilling to join in stabilizing export prices for petroleum products. Sir Henri in his speech in Chicago touched at some length on what he considered the folly of America in exporting oil products today at low prices when, in his opinion, this country is likely to be importing later at higher prices.

The Royal Dutch interests, through their paramount position in Venezuela, now the second largest oil-producing country in the world, have a weapon which may easily be used against American producers. Repeated efforts have been made, without any effective result, to limit production in Venezuela. The Lago Oil and Transport Corporation, a subsidiary of the Pan-American Petroleum and Transport Company, is the second largest producer in Venezuela, and the problem has been to get this company and the Royal Dutch subsidiary there to agree on a plan of curtailment. The Standard Oil Company of Indiana, as the parent company of Pan-American, really controls Lago. The Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, through its subsidiary, the Creole Petroleum Corporation, also has large holdings in Venezuela, where its production is being increased rapidly.

American Producers Concerned.

Many of the American producers, particularly in the Southwest, have been concerned over the steady increase in imports of crude oil from Venezuela. The contention is made, of course, that these imports are having the same disturbing effect on the crude oil market in this country as are the exports to Europe about which Sir Henri has complained. Sir Henri's companies, as the largest producers in Venezuela, have been blamed for the fact that curtailment has not been accomplished there. The Royal Dutch interests, on the other hand, contend that the American interests are responsible for the race for production in Venezuela.

American oil executives declined, rather pointedly, to discuss in Chicago the suggestions of the Royal Dutch managing director with respect to conservation. Privately, some of them let it be known that they felt that Sir Henri was advocating an international oil trust, participation in which, they said, would be impossible for American oil companies.

Sir Henri in his address took cognizance of the talk about setting up an oil trust.

"Do not be led away," he said, "by the noise of publications about trusts. Some publications can only exist by making cheap noises. If we do what we honestly believe is our duty to the public, nothing ought to stop us from doing that duty. It is a happy man who is never reproached by his conscience."

Foreign Expansion Here.

Some of the American oil groups do not feel kindly toward the Royal Dutch interests because of the rapid manner in which the latter are expanding their operations in the United States. Royal Dutch's subsidiaries are now operating in every State in the Union. Their marketing operations, particularly in the eastern section of the country, have become unusually aggressive in recent months. The Shell subsidiary is operating extensively throughout New York State and in New England, where it has come into active competition with the Standard Oil Company of New York as well as with the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, two of the principal units in the Rockefeller group. Oil men generally feel that the possibility of cooperation between the Royal Dutch and the large American companies is remote, largely because of the Royal Dutch's expansion of its American business.

Members of the American Petroleum Institute are concerned at

Action on 129 Railway Labor Cases in Year Reported by Federal Board of Mediation

The report of the United States Board of Mediation for the government's fiscal year ended on June 30 contains the opinion that labor relations with the carriers are on the best basis they have ever been. It describes the working of the Watson-Parker or railway labor act as having fulfilled all expectations. It states also that there seems to be no outstanding evidence of the injection of industrial or commercial projects in transactions to which the Board of Mediation was a party.

The board acted in 129 cases involving wages, rules and working conditions in the year. The case that affected the most employes was the dispute between the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employes and the American Railway Express Company, now the Railway Express Agency. About 55,000 clerical workers were interested in the case. Another case between the same union and the Pennsylvania Railroad, which was ended by action of the board, involved 32,982 employes.

The Order of Railway Conductors and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen were involved in a case affecting about 100 railroads, including branches, and operating 138,672 miles of line. There were 42,000 employes affected. Another case ended by action of the board involved 10,865 pullman porters, the parties to the case being the Pullman Company and the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters.

There were 30,000 maintenance of way employes of the Pennsylvania System Fraternity involved in a case with the Pennsylvania Railroad, but it was withdrawn before mediation was instituted. Another case settled by the board involved 17,500 members of the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employes and the Chicago & North Western Railway.

In the fiscal year ended June 30 the board received thirty-seven applications for adjudication of grievances, making sixty-nine such cases received since the board's creation. Of the sixty-nine cases, forty-five had been settled by the date of the report. Of the remaining cases, nineteen were assigned to mediation and six remained unassigned. Of the 428 cases involving pay, rules and working conditions submitted, 389 had been settled by June 30.

Copper Producers Believed Victorious In Their Long Fight to Stabilize Price

Close observers of the copper market have formed the opinion that American producers of the metal have won their fight to stabilize the price. For the second time this year the producers have been placed under pressure through demand and lack of demand, and through both attacks the price has been maintained at 18 cents. Observers now believe that the price has become stabilized at that figure.

The copper market is in the midst of one of the longest periods of slack demand which it has ever undergone. The non-buying period, however, has overrun itself into a period when no demand is expected. The fact that prices did not break by Dec. 1 has been taken as an indication that producers have made their production schedules pliable enough so that they can keep their output reasonably well within the limit of demand.

The fight for stabilization of the price of copper started early this year. The demand from the beginning of the year until well into February reached a new peak and the price soared. When it passed 23 cents, the producers became frankly worried, for a price higher than 22 cents makes the use of substitutes a profitable thing for fabricators, and once the use of substitutes has been started, it is admitted, it is hard to get the fabricators back to the use of copper.

The overbuying period was followed by a long period of lack of demand. This had been anticipated by the producers, however, because of the enormous amount which had been purchased during the buying "spree," and, despite efforts of speculators to hold off purchases, the price held at 18 cents. The long recession in buying, however, started another market in which demand ran far ahead of supply during August. At that time the producers sold what they had available at 18 cents and withdrew from the market rather than sell futures at an advanced price.

During the latter part of November it was freely predicted that the lack of buying would cause a break in the price. However, no distress copper appeared in the market, and generally the larger producers report that their supply and production schedule is about equal to deliveries that are to be made between now and Jan. 1.

FINANCIAL MARKETS

Sharp Recovery in Numerous Stocks, With Active Trading—Events of a Week.

Transactions on the Stock Exchange yesterday increased so considerably that the day's total sales, 3,002,560 shares, were actually the largest of any open Saturday this year, except Oct. 19. The comparison does not mean as much as might at first glance be imagined, because the Stock Exchange was closed on five successive Saturdays in November, when week-end liquidation might otherwise have been very large; also on Saturday in several tempestuous weeks of March and February. Yesterday's active business was not widely distributed. The really heavy trading was concentrated chiefly in half a dozen stocks, most of which were declared by Wall Street to be preparing readjustment of capital stock, in imitation of General Electric.

In a few of these stocks the day's extreme advances ranged from 10 to 21 points, but in the rest of the market changes were mostly small. The trend was distinctly upward, however, except where, as with General Electric's 4-point decline, realizing sales were heavy after the preceding day's advance. Wall Street's resolute effort to revive what had seemed to be the broken charm of "four-for-one split-ups" was interesting; possibly a bit pathetic. It appeared to serve its purpose yesterday; but chiefly, as any one could guess, through the dislodging of a widely extended "bear account," whose retreat has been long expected.

Money continued easy last week because of the immense Stock Exchange liquidation, though it showed some sign of greater firmness at the week-end. Sterling exchange rose ⅜ cent to the highest rate since December, 1927; partly, no doubt, because money rates on Lombard Street had of late been hardening while our own were still going down, but mostly because the exodus of foreign capital from New York, such as always follows a crisis on the American Stock Exchanges, was indisputably continuing. The outward gold movement has already begun with very substantial shipments to France and Switzerland—the Swiss market is a little noticed but not at all unimportant investor in the United States—and, with sterling also virtually at the gold-export point, movement of gold in quantity to London is now expected before the year-end.

The situation in general trade continued last week to puzzle even Wall Street. It has perplexed even the merchants. Some signs unquestionable indicate continued reaction. Cotton mills are reported to be curtailing production; some of the woolen mills have temporarily shut down. The steel mills, as described by The Iron Age, are striving to "keep unemployment at a minimum"; arranging, wherever a plant "is running on only one shift," to "give an equal share of the operating time to the crews of all three of the operating shift." Allowance will naturally be made, in all such incidents, for the not infrequent slackening of output at a year-end. December's steel production decreased considerably in 1928 and 1926, though it increased in 1927 and 1924, and mill consumption of cotton has fallen off heavily in this month of the past two years.

Nevertheless, the shrinkage which has thus far occurred this season is plainly enough of a different character. Its testimony, whatever it may be worth for anything but the immediate future, is reinforced by the freight-loading figures, whose report last Wednesday showed loadings in the third week of November to have been less by 7 to 11 per cent than in the same week of 1928, 1926, 1925 or 1924. There is still a curious partial parallel with these various industrial returns at the end of 1927, when people refused even to speak of trade reaction and called it "mild recession." It remains to be seen whether recovery from the present reaction will be as abrupt and substantial as it was after 1927.

HYDROELECTRIC POWER INCREASED IN OCTOBER

Heavy Rains Improved Situation in East—Pacific Coast Drought Continues.

The heavy rains of the early Fall improved stream flow and the water power situation in the East, according to the statistical research department of the National Electric Light Association, in a review of the production of electricity during October. As a result of the increased water supply the generation of electricity by such power along the Eastern seaboard rose more than 30 per cent over September.

On the Pacific Coast, however, the effects of more than two years of subnormal precipitation are beginning to be felt with increasing severity. In addition to this the available flow of water is encountering the usual reduction which accompanies the freezing of the mountain streams. Because of these factors the October output of water power in this region was the smallest of any month since February, 1927, and fell 20 per cent below that of October, 1928.

The net result of the Summer's drought throughout the United States has been to hold the total hydroelectric output for the first ten months, by all agencies which contribute to the country's supply, at exactly the same figure which prevailed for the first ten months of 1928, while the output of steam plants increased by 19 per cent.

TOPICS IN WALL STREET.

News, Comment and Incident, On the Stock Exchange and In the Financial Markets.

United States Steel held the spotlight in yesterday's active dealings on the Stock Exchange. In a spectacular sweep this issue climbed into new high ground for the present recovery and carried a considerable list of stocks along with it in the advance. The market passed through two periods of buoyancy, one occurring soon after the opening, the other in the last few minutes of trading. At the beginning of the second hour extreme dullness developed. This was overcome, however, when Steel started its lively advance. Among the stocks that followed the leader were Anaconda, General Motors, Radio, Montgomery Ward, Westinghouse Electric and International Telephone and Telegraph. General Electric, which was the feature of Friday's advance, reacted somewhat sharply.

Fighting the Trend.

It is one of the oldest of Wall Street axioms that no one ever got rich "fighting a market trend." Nevertheless, most of the professionals on the floor of the Stock Exchange have been doing that very thing, and at present find themselves with 5 to 25 point losses staring them in the face. They entirely misjudged the ability of the market to make such vigorous recovery as it has achieved, particularly in the last week. Yet in that recovery, stocks merely repeated the market's action after every violent panic break on record.

Talk of a "Steel Split-up."

Much of the activity in United States Steel yesterday was ascribed to persistent reports that a split-up of the common stock is in prospect. There has been no official intimation that the directors had worked out a plan, but in some usually well-informed quarters it is believed that consideration shortly will be given to it, if there has not been some discussion already. The split-up was first talked of months ago, when Steel was soaring around 250.

The President and the Crash.

The President's reference to the Wall Street crash in his message to Congress referred frankly to the "wave of uncontrolled speculation in securities" which had followed the overstimulating of trade. Mr. Hoover's recognition of the facts led last week to some reminiscence of other Presidential messages after other panics. President Wilson's final message to Congress in December of 1920 made no reference to the immense deflation in prices that had already occurred, and the treasury report had little to say on the subject. In that year, however, the acute Wall Street panic occurred at the end of December, after the Presidential message. In 1907 Mr. Roosevelt made his Presidential message mostly an attack on the wealthy promoters. President Cleveland's message to the special session of 1893 was practically given up to urging repeal of the silver purchase act. In December the Secretary of the Treasury wrote, in his report to Congress, that "the worst effects of the recent panic disturbances and consequent business depression have been realized," and he predicted an adequate public revenue. Both statements turned out to be completely erroneous.

Investment Trusts See Anomaly.

One of the anomalies of the present rally, according to investment trust executives, is the fact that their own shares have failed utterly to keep pace with the advance of other groups of stocks which have appreciated in value from 20 to 80 per cent in the last month. Since many investment trusts are known to hold large blocks of the industrial and utility issues which have shown the sharpest advances, the executives cannot understand why their own issues have not shown a corresponding appreciation in value. In purchasing several investment trust stocks, at current levels, the executive declared, it is possible to obtain a diversified list of high grade common stocks at a discount of from 25 to 33 1-3 per cent compared with the present market prices. But all investment trust stocks are confronted with the $2,300,000,000 new shares of the same or kindred companies, issued and underwritten in the first ten months of 1929.

The Coming Outflow of Gold.

Gold, as a leading British economist has pleasantly remarked, has no practical value except to dentists. Its status as a measure of value for everything else, the basis of all the principal currencies of the world and the foundation of credit, is far removed from bridgework and inlays. An inward movement of gold, presaging easier credit conditions, has often been made the basis of a bull movement in stocks, and an outward flow of any considerable proportions has usually cast gloom over the financial community. Economists are generally agreed that this country faces a very considerable export movement of gold in the next few months. Estimates of the amount this country could lose without bad effect on the credit situation vary from $200,000,000 to $500,000,000. Most bankers say that we could easily afford to lose a large part of our immense gold holdings and still feel confident of continued easy money, while the movement should greatly benefit Europe and help our foreign trade.

Bank Exchanges a Puzzle.

Last week's compilations of bank checks drawn in the United States during November caused a good deal of surprise. The total bank clearings in the country were 15¾ per cent larger than in November, 1928. This seemed anomalous, because last month's transactions in shares on the Stock Exchange were nearly 40 per cent less than in 1928. The lighter total business was largely due to the numerous special Stock Exchange holidays; nevertheless the actual fact of greatly decreased stock transactions would seemingly tend to make bank clearings smaller than in 1928 instead of larger. In New York City alone bank clearings last month were 20⅝ per cent above those of November, 1928; yet New York bore the brunt both of the reduced total Stock Exchange transactions and of the great reduction in prices compared with a year ago. One explanation suggested for the puzzle was that very large payments may have been made against transactions on stocks, possibly for the "taking-over of accounts," which were not represented by sales on the Stock Exchange.

Last Week's Movements of Gold.

Movements of gold at the port of New York last week were featured by a shipment of about $10,000,000 to France and another special transfer of $5,005,000 to Switzerland. Exports for the week totaled $15,019,000. In addition to the shipments to France and Switzerland one of $14,000 went to Mexico. Imports came to $1,788,000 of which $1,674,000 came from Argentina and $114,000 from other Latin-American countries.

OUTFLOW OF GOLD NOW LOOMS HERE

Rises in Foreign Currencies Increase Possibility of Heavy Exports.

'GOLD POINT' UNDETERMINED

Various and Complex Factors Govern the Price of Profitable Shipments.

The approach of several leading European currencies to levels at which large scale exports of gold from this market become a lively possibility has attracted interest to the subject of the "gold points," those theoretical prices at which it becomes cheaper to ship gold in payment of a bill than to purchase exchange.

Depending as they do upon a number of variable factors, the gold points are at best only approximate figures. Foreign exchange experts often show wide disagreement among themselves as to the prices at which gold can be shipped between world markets. A recent survey among the principal banks of the city has disclosed that no one of them possesses an up-to-date list of gold points, and those which do have figures for the principal currencies are reluctant frequently to reveal them for fear that competitors may take advantage of their research.

The reason for this obscurity becomes more apparent when the uncertainties surrounding gold shipments are considered. In theory the gold point on sterling—that it, the upper gold point—has been reached when it becomes cheaper for an American merchant who has an account to pay in London to take gold, ship it to London and pay his debt with it than to buy a bill on London in the foreign exchange market.

Other Factors Involved.

Actually no merchant would pay his account in this way. When the exchange reaches such a point, experts will ship the gold and buy back their dollars with the sovereigns they receive from the Bank of England. It not infrequently happens, however, that these theoretical gold points are reached without any metal moving, due to the intervention of other factors.

The obvious conditions governing gold movements are the cost of shipping and insurance and the loss of interest involved while the funds represented by the metal are idle. These factors alone are sufficiently complex. Shipping and insurance costs may vary, while the time element is subject to considerable hazard. When a sum of $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 is involved, loss of a day's interest above what was calculated may prove very costly.

In Winter it is a not uncommon occurrence for ships to be delayed by gales or fog, and in the best seasons such mishaps as that which occurred a few days ago to the Mauretania, outward bound with a shipment of gold, may hold up the transaction for many costly hours. When the shipment is to travel further than between London and New York, there may be train schedules in distant lands to consult or calculations as to how long it will take stevedores in Melbourne or Rio de Janeiro to unload a cargo.

Question of Price of Gold.

When shipping and insurance charges and interest rates have been calculated, the problem is still far from solved. There remains, for example, the price of gold. It appears at first thought paradoxical that gold, in which the price of all things is expressed, should itself have a price. But gold is of little use to any but dentists and jewelers until it has been transformed into currency.

In countries where a gold standard is maintained any one may take bar gold to the bank of issue and have minted therefrom a specified number of gold coins. The Bank of England, for example, is compelled by law to turn gold bullion into sovereigns for whoever demands it.

Such a process, however, takes time and in the meanwhile the owner of the gold is losing interest on his money. In practice the importer sells his gold to the central bank at the bank's buying rate. This latter is usually below the minting rate and may be changed by the bank so as to make gold movements unprofitable. Similarly in securing the gold from the central bank of the country from which shipments take place it is not always possible to buy the metal at a price to make transfers profitable.

Bar gold may not be available and then coin must be taken. Not all of these coins will be of standard weight, and the wear and tear of packing, unpacking and shipping is likely to cause still further abrasion. When the metal comes to be weighed and melted down at the bank to which it is taken, the importers of the gold may find their profit has been rubbed away at the edges.

Imports as Fiscal Stimulant.

Still other and less tangible factors involving gold movements include advertising value and the desire of the banks of issue in the markets involved to secure or retain their gold holdings.

Banks generally regard it as good publicity to import gold and as bad publicity to export it. These factors weigh upon their decisions, or at least make them secretive. In time past bull operators in the stock markets of the world have been known to arrange unprofitable gold imports for the sake of the "cocktail" offered to financial sentiment through the prospect of easier money and indication of favorable trade balances.

In some cases central banks have credited importers of gold as soon as the metal was put on the ship, thereby saving them the loss of interest and facilitating a transfer. In others central banks, desiring to replenish their gold reserves, have arranged imports at a loss.

Recent weeks have witnessed several gold exports from this market which were clearly unprofitable, but which were motivated evidently by special requirements. On the other hand, the pound sterling has for several days recently been quoted at prices which some foreign exchange experts consider the gold point and which in the past have resulted in movements of the metal, but so far as can be learned no gold has yet been shipped to England. In large measure this is due to uncertainty as to the price which the metal would bring at the Bank of England.

SECURITY OFFERINGS GAIN IN 11 MONTHS

Total Put at $5,920,260,000, Against $5,687,831,000 in Same Period of 1928.

New offerings of stocks and bonds in the United States for the eleven months ended Nov. 30 totaled $5,920,260,000, exclusive of domestic and Canadian municipal issues. This compares with $5,687,831,000 during the corresponding period in 1928. New financing during November showed a sharp falling off, with the exception of municipal offerings and offerings of stocks against rights proposed before the collapse of the stock market. There were several instances during the month of rights being withdrawn or extended owing to the fact that market prices dropped to levels below or close to those at which stockholders were privileged to subscribe.

One of the features of the November financing was the absence of any issues of investment trusts or financial companies. An analysis of the financing for the eleven months, however, shows the offerings of investment trust and financial companies led with a total of $2,135,175,000, with public utility companies next with $994,878,000 and real estate mortgage offerings third with a total of $381,700,000. The oil industry was fourth with $371,719,000.

Harris, Forbes & Co. headed the list of bond houses from the standpoint of volume of new offerings in 1929. The house appeared as head of syndicates marketing a total of $362,658,500. Dillon, Read & Co. displaced the National City Company for second position with a total of $232,986,668. The total for the National City amounted to $232,594,736, but as syndicate head or participant it offering new issues in the amount of $913,878,736. Lee, Higginson & Co. remtined in fourth place, which they held at the end of October, with a total as of Nov. 30 of $371,719,000 of issues in which they appeared as syndicate manager.

The following table, compiled under the supervision of Otto P. Schwarzchild, editor of American Underwriting Houses and Their Issues, shows the activities of the fifteen investment houses with the highest totals of new financing during the first eleven months of the year:

Railroad financing for the first eleven months of 1929 amounted to but $214,038,000. Canadian corporate financing reached $271,039,000 and other foreign corporate financing $189,533,000. Foreign government and municipal financing, other than Canadian, aggregated $68,250,000.

ASKS BOND ISSUE SANCTION

Cleveland Terminal Company Would Reimburse Roads for Advances.

WASHINGTON., Dec. 7 (AP).—Permission was asked today by the Cleveland Union Terminal Company from the Interstate Commerce Commission to issue $18,000,000 of gold bonds to be guaranteed by the New York Central, the Big Four and the Nickel Plate Railroads.

The funds would be used to reimburse in part the roads which are building the terminal for advances already made. These now total $29,666,400.

The application cites that the terminal originally was estimated to cost $60,565,818, but now is expected to exceed that amount by approximately $28,000,000.

The bonds will be 4½ per cent first mortgage fifty-year sinking fund gold bonds and will be sold at the best prices obtainable but not less than 92 per cent of the par values.

TRUSTS INVESTING IN OTHER TRUSTS

statements. Not all investment trust executives have approved this policy, however. Those who approve it say the slump presented the trusts with an opportunity to buy their own shares at a fraction of their true value. Others, however, contend that in buying back their stock under these conditions, the trusts were taking advantage of the temporary embarrassment of some of their shareholders. It is generally agreed, however, that these purchases supplied the investment trust stocks with a measure of support during the decline.

BOND MARKET FIRM BUT TRADING LIGHT

Government Issues Recede on Profit-Taking—Convertibles Generally Higher.

NEW HIGHS IN RAIL GROUP

Public Utility Securities Steady—Loans of French Cities at Peaks for the Year.

There was not much zest in trading in bonds on the Stock Exchange yesterday during the two-hour period. United States Government bonds closed lower, due to profit-taking following the run-up of prices to new high prices for the year on the preceding day. Railroad bonds, however, were generally firm, with several issues mounting to new peaks for 1929. Foreign loans were steady.

Among rail issues to attain new highs for the year to date were the following: Canadian National Railway 5s of 1969, at 100¾; Big Four 4½s, Series E, of 1977, at 100½, up 3½ points; Erie consolidated 4s, at 88, and convertible 4s, Series B, at 85¾; Mobile & Ohio 4½s of 1949, at 97, and New York Connecting Railway 4½s, at 98½.

Convertible bonds generally were higher, led by the International Telephone and Telegraph 4½s, which jumped 4½ points, and the American Telephone and Telegraph 4½s, which were up 1¾ points. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé convertible 4½s were unchanged at 134½ and the Texas Corporation convertible 5s at 102.

In the industrial group, Cuban Dominican Sugar 7½s of 1944 certificates dropped ⅞ point to to a new low for the year at 43. Camaguey Sugar 7s, however, moved up 2 points for the day. Public utility issues were generally steady. Public Service Corporation of New Jersey convertible 4½s, however, dropped 2 points. New York traction loans were steady, with the exception of Broadway Seventh Avenue 5s of 1943, which dipped to a new low at 35¼ for the year.

All the active United States Government issues closed lower, with the exception of the first Liberty 4¼s, which held unchanged. The balance of the list was off 1-32 to 5-32.

Most of the net changes in the foreign list were routine. French city bonds were strong. Bordeaux 6s, Lyons 6s, Marseilles 6s and Soissons 6s touching new highs for the year to date.

$879,686,777 in New Jersey In Privately Owned Utilities

The privately owned public utilities operated in New Jersey had vested capital of $879,686,777 at the end of 1928, according to a compilation by the New Jersey Public Utility Information Committee. The electric industry led with $292,550,693, divided among nine companies, followed by fifteen electric railways with an investment of $242,608,682.

The telephone industry was third with a $157,298,499 investment shared by thirteen companies, while the gas industry had $99,389,985, in which fifteen companies participated. Thirty-five water companies had $83,404,264 invested and four sewerage companies, $4,435,654.

AMERICANS HELP FORM BRITISH CAN COMPANY

Concern to Manufacture Containers Will Use American Can and Thermokept Patents.

Details were received in New York yesterday of the plan by which a British industrial and financial group headed by the British Shareholders Trust, Ltd., has organized the British Can Company, in cooperation with the American Can Company and the Thermokept Corporation. The new company will manufacture containers for tobacco, fruit, vegetables, meat and other canned products in the British Isles.

The British Can Company has acquired Ernest Taylor, Ltd., of Liverpool, a large manufacturing enterprise. Additional factories are to be constructed in Liverpool equipped with the automatic and labor-saving machinery perfected by the American Can Company. Under an agreement the British company will have the exclusive right to purchase and use in the British Isles the can-making machinery of the American Can Company and the can-closing machinery for packing foods and other products under vacuum of the Thermokept Corporation.

The British company will also have the benefit of the technical and research specialties of American and Thermokeph. The American group will have an active part in the management of the company.

Robert M. McMullen, chairman of the Thermokept Corporation, said yesterday that the "formation of the British Can Company marks a long stride in that industry in the British Isles." He added: "The American Can Company and the Thermokept Corporation will own a very substantial amount of stock in the British company. The new company will begin operations equipped with the latest facilities."

American members of the new company's board will include Harry Craver, vice president of the American Can Company, and George K. Morrow, chairman of the Gold Dust Corporation.

Get many bargains with one investment

Many securities now sell, say bankers and others, at bargain levels. How can you best turn such a situation to your profit? By investing in one of these stocks? Perhaps.

But would you not have greater safety and greater opportunities for profit if you should invest, not in one, but in 275 of the soundest banks, public utilities, railroads and industrial companies in America?

Federated Capital automatically gives you just such a broad interest in the country's leading securities. You get many bargains with one investment.

In accompanying tables, compiled by THE NEW YORK TIMES, are listed bonds and stocks called for redemption.

TWO NEW COMPANIES TO DEAL IN SECURITIES

Associated Securities Dealers Corporation and 1929 Corporation Get Delaware Charters.

Charters were filed yesterday at Dover, Del., for two new corporations with total capitalization of $34,000,000 to deal in stocks, bonds and other securities. One, the 1929 Corporation, has initial capitalization of $13,000,000 and 100,000 shares of no par stock. The $13,000,000 will consist of 30,000 shares of preferred stock with par value of $3,000,000 and 100,000 shares of $100 par value Class A stock amounting to $10,000,000. The company will deal in stocks, bonds, notes, scrip and all certificates of indebtedness.

A charter was filed also for the Associated Securities Dealers' Corporation to have capitalization of $21,000,000, consisting of 2,000,000 shares of $10 par value preferred participating stock and 1,000,000 shares of $1 par value each of common stock. No explanation of the functions of the company was given beyond the statement that it would deal in stocks, bonds and other securities.

87% CASH AND CALL LOANS.

Mutual Investment Trust Has Only .33% in Common Stocks.

The Mutual Investment Trust announced yesterday that cash and call loans on Nov. 30 comprised 87.60 per cent of its total assets. Of the balance, 1.67 per cent was invested in common stocks, .33 per cent in preferred stocks, 8.06 per cent in long term bonds, and 2.34 per cent in short term bonds.

The only common stocks in the company's portfolio were American Power & Light Company, Fireman's Fund Insurance Company of California and Public Service of Northern Illinois.

RECORD EXPANSION BY STOCK EXCHANGE

the gallery in the past year was 318, compared with 203 in the previous year.

Naturally the mechanical facilities of trading had to be enlarged, revised and expanded to cope with the additional trading volume. The Year Book says that at the opening of the twelve months a new quotation system for reporting bid and asked prices to member concerns was put into operation. Within five months it had been extended to every post on the floor, and now 123 boys are employed to carry quotations from the various posts to the quotation room, where 69 girls operate the switch boards and answer inquiries for quotations.

The average number of quotations given out daily since last February, when the new system was extended to cover all stocks, is 30,000. The high record was reached on Oct. 4, when 42,114 quotations were given out. There are 315 wires from brokers' offices that run direct to the quotation switch board and are used only for obtaining quotations.

Besides the quotation room switchboard there are three other telephone switchboards in the Stock Exchange building, carrying 187 trunk lines and 357 extensions and twelve tie lines and long-distance connections. In addition 1,921 private wires from brokerage houses run directly to the floor and 166 wires are handled through the automatic switchboard.

1,800,000 Phone Calls a Day.

Approximately 1,800,000 calls are transmitted on each five-hour trading day on the private wires from brokers' offices to the floor of the Exchange. These calls average fifteen for each five minutes of the day on each of the 1,921 telephones. About 1,400 telephone clerks are on the floor to handle the orders contained in the calls.

The news of sales are carried throughout the country and into Canada by 9,707 stock tickers and 1,068 bond tickers, carrying quotations on stocks and bonds into 346 cities, 41 States and territories and Canada.

The average consumption of tape used in printing quotations by a single ticker on an ordinary 5,000,000-share day is about 2,500 feet, or about a half mile. On Oct. 29, when the volume of sales passed 16,000,000 shares, approximately 80,000,000 feet, or 15,000 miles of tape, were used. In the first nine months of 1929, when sales totaled more than 825,000,000 shares, establishing a new record for such a period, approximately 4,000,000,000 feet, or 757,575 miles of tape had run through the tickers.

Another section of the Stock Exchange that has undergone rapid expansion in the last year is the stock transfer department of the Stock Clearing Corporation. The department permits brokers to carry loans on stocks while they are in the process of transfer by issuing certificates accepted by banks for stock deposited for transfer of registration.

Organized in 1923, the first year showed that certificates had been issued for $42,000,000. In one day this year $96,000,000 worth of certificates were issued to brokers, and the amount of certificates outstanding during the past year has averaged about $150,000,000 daily. The certificates are good for only five days, the ordinary time required for the transfer or registration of stocks.

TO BEGIN INSTALLING HIGH-SPEED TICKERS

Western Union to Start Nation-Wide Work Here Tomorrow for Stock Market Service.

CHANGE COSTS $4,500,000

New Machines Are Capable of 500 Characters a Minute—3,000 for This City.

The Western Union Telegraph Company tomorrow will begin work on the nation-wide installation of new high-speed stock tickers, in response to the demands of business men, brokers and the general public for a much faster quotation service to keep pace with the new era of 6,000,000 and 8,000,000 share trading days.

The changes, involving an expense of $4,500,000, are the most extensive in the history of stock tickers, and are the culmination of three years of laboratory experimentation and development, six months of training of technical personnel in specially established schools in five cities, the construction of 5,000 miles of new intercity wires, the mapping of numerous circuit changes in 350 cities and towns from coast to coast, and an enormous amount of other preparatory work.

Equipment for eighty-two automatic repeater stations and 10,000 high-speed tickers are in process of manufacture and delivery, and now all is ready for the actual installation of tickers to begin. The first of high-speed tickers will be installed in the financial district here after the New York Stock Exchange closes tomorrow afternoon. New tickers will be installed overnight, serving brokerage offices, and will be in operation on Tuesday morning.

To prevent discrimination, the new tickers will be operated at exactly the speed of the old ones until all the old tickers in the country have been replaced, although the new tickers are capable of a speed of 500 characters a minute, nearly double that of the old. About 3,000 new tickers will be installed on Western Union circuits in New York City in about four months, and at least six months longer will be necessary to rush work in the rest of the country to completion, indicating the operation of all tickers at high speed in the United States and Canada in about ten months.

New transmitting offices have been installed at 40 Broad Street, the downtown quotation office of the Western Union company, and at 24 Walker Street, from which the rest of the country is served. The new offices will be operated separately from the old quotation sending offices until the latter are dispensed with. A complete emergency transmitting plant is held in reserve.

CANADA PLANS SHIP LINES.

Asks Tenders on African-Indian Service to Ascertain Cost.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7.—New steamship services to Africa and India may be established by the Canadian Government to stimulate Canadian exports to these countries, according to a report received in the Department of Commerce. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has authorized calls for tenders to ascertain the probable cost.

The first tender will be for a regular monthly sailing from a St. Lawrence port during the season of navigation, and from an ocean port in Eastern Canada during the Winter season, proceeding on each voyage to Gibraltar, Malta, one port in Palestine, and Alexandria, Port Said, Suez, Aden, Mombassa, Tanga, Zanzibar and Dar es Salaam.

The second tender is to cover a regular monthly sailing from a St. Lawrence port during the navigation season and from an ocean port in Eastern Canada during the Winter, to at least one port of Egypt and Ceylon; and, at the option of the contractors, three or more of the following ports in India: Karachi, Bombay, Madras and Calcutta.

The Canadian Government plans to establish both of these services during the early part of May, 1930. The steamships to be used must be of British registry.

CONSERVATION OF OIL REGARDED NEARER

present over the excessive production of gasoline in this country. This, they feel, is the problem which must be corrected without delay, or all that has been accomplished toward conservation of crude oil in various sections of the country will be destroyed. The institute's attitude on this question was expressed in a report sent to President Hoover's business conference in Washington last week.

Report Made to Hoover.

The institute pointed out that "by voluntary action on the part of individual producers in the several States" a balance has been brought about between crude oil production and current refinery demand. But the producing situation, oil men feel, cannot be kept in hand so long as there is pressure from the refineries for larger and larger quantities of crude.

Although no official action has been taken by the institute, it is believed that the directors will within a short time consider plans to curb refinery operations. In other words, the emphasis in the conservation movement will be placed on the refinery branch of the business instead of on the producing end, as in the past. Oil men interested in the conservation movement have been hoping that the refinery problem would solve itself, but thus far it has not done so. Gasoline has been overproduced this year to the amount of about 8,000,000 barrels.

COUNTER QUOTATIONS CONTINUE TO ADVANCE

Banks and Insurance Shares Lead Again in Upturns—Most of Industrials Higher.

Further gains were registered by the favorites on the over-the-counter market yesterday as the upswing that began Friday continued through the short session. Good buying marked the banking group, with the result that United States Trust, First National of New York, Brooklyn Trust, Bank of New York and Trust, City, Lawyers Title and Guarantee, Public and Manhattan were all higher at the close.

The same good feeling prevailed in the insurance group, and Home stock and rights, Travelers, Providence-Washington, Hartford Fire, Aetna Casualty and Surety, Aetna Fire, Globe and Rutgers and National Fire all closed higher.

Most industrials were higher. Crowell Publishing, new and old; American Meter and Draper Corporation gained ground. Technicolor was off slightly. Chain stores were generally firm, with little activity. In the sugar group gains were made by Fajardo, National and United Porto Rican preferred.

NEWS OF MARKETS IN PARIS AND BERLIN

French Stocks Continue to Advance, With the Banks Especially Strong.

GOVERNMENT BONDS FIRM

Uprising on German Boerse Is Led by Artificial Silks—Reaction Near Close.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Dec. 7.—Favorable conditions prevailed at the week's closing session of the Bourse today. The upward movement of prices which began on Wednesday continued and more gains were registered in the leading groups. Banks especially were strong. Optimism is felt regarding the fate of the budget coming up for debate in the Chamber of Deputies, so political developments are having no unfavorable effect on the market.

French rentes continued firm, closing as follows: The 3 per cents, 81.70; 1918 4s, 98.30; 1920 amortizable 5s, 128.70; 1928 5s, 102.50; 1920 6s, 103.75; 1927 amortizable 6s, 109.45.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Dec. 7.—Stimulated by improvement in artificial silks, the Boerse opened the last day of the week with a firm tendency, although the volume of trading was small. The unfavorable influence which Dr. Schacht's statement against the Young plan had yesterday seems to have been overcome, especially as the Cabinet announced its intention to submit a plan of financial reform to the Reichstag on Wednesday.

Bemberg, of the artificial silks, improved 18 and A. K. U. shares 14 points. Schwartzkopff was in heavy demand, advancing 8 points. Siemens rose 6 points and other electricals were several points better.

Reichsbank advanced to 279, the mining group improved 1 to 3 points and the potash group, dye trust, Karstadt and Polyphon were also firm. Due to realization sales the tendency changed toward the close and part of the day's gains were lost.

AUSTRIA TO BORROW HERE.

Viennese Lawyer Says Country Is Sound, but Needs Loans.

The economic situation in Austria is essentially sound, according to Dr. Eduard Kast, Vienna corporation lawyer and counselor to several American banks and corporations for their interests abroad. Austria's currency is stable and her credit is well established, he said.

Among the problems facing the country, he added, are unemployment, raising capital for public investments of a productive character and supplying agriculture with capital at reasonable terms. The last of these, he said, is vital to Austria's trade balance.

The agricultural situation, Dr. Kast said, will probably bring Austria into the American market as a borrower.

BLOCK-MALONEY CO. SPLIT INTO 2 FIRMS

Successors Will Be Benjamin Block & Co. and Peter J. Maloney & Co.

HARRIS-WINTHROP CHANGES

Partners Named for New Houses of Harris, Upham & Co. and Winthrop, Mitchell & Co.

Formation of two new partnerships resulting from the dissolution of the New York Stock Exchange firm of Block, Maloney & Co. was announced yesterday. The Block, Maloney firm, one of the best known in the financial district, will be dissolved on Dec. 31.

Benjamin Block and associates have formed the firm of Benjamin Block & Co., which will begin business on Dec. 31 at 50 Broadway. The partners, besides Mr. Block, will be J. Horace Block and Bernard Miller, floor members; William B. Anderson, Alfred L. Rosener, Albert F. Straight and William B. Giles.

Peter J. Maloney and his son, Peter J. Maloney Jr., have formed the firm of Peter J. Maloney & Co., with offices at 50 Broadway. The elder Mr. Maloney is the floor member.

The full list of partners in the firms of Harris, Upham & Co. and Winthrop, Mitchell & Co., resulting from the proposed dissolution on Dec. 12 of the firm of Harris, Winthrop & Co., was announced also. The Harris Upham partners will be George U. Harris, Thomas S. Adams, and John O. Middlebrook, floor members; John F. Harris, John P. Upham, Charles E. Booth Jr., Donald McL. Miller, Henry U. Harris, Albert Francke, Carl H. Narr, Philip F. Hartung, C. Lansing Hays and J. Leonard Replogle. The firm will begin business Dec. 12 with offices at 11 Wall Street.

The partners in Winthrop, Mitchell & Co. will be Richard P. Loasby, Harry C. Schaack and Alfred I. Preston Jr., floor members; Henry Rogers Winthrop, Theodore E. Cunningham, John J. Fagan, George R. Thornton, Walter Schuttler, Richard B. W. Hall, Leeds Mitchell, Woodward Babcock, James I. Bush, Richard F. Babcock, Henry F. Godfrey, Wendell S. Kuhn, Milton W. Holden and Clifford M. Leonard. The firm's offices will be at 26 Broadway. It will begin business next Thursday.

New York Central. The commission, it is supposed, would favor retention of the Boston & Albany by the New York Central and recommend placing the New Haven in the Pennsylvania System.

The problem in the East is regarded as simple in comparison with those in other sections of the country. It is considered probable that the commission will recommend the alignment of Southern systems along existing lines, with the Seaboard Air Line connected with the Southern Railway.

It has been predicted, too, that the commission will allocate the St. Louis Southwestern to the Illinois Central. Mr. Loree's plan for that region was to link the St. Louis Southwestern with the Missouri-Kansas-Texas and the Kansas City Southern. This plan was dropped, but there has been hope in his camp that the commission would favor such a unification. The Central of Georgia, it is believed, would be made part of the Illinois Central.

What the commission will do with the Central of New Jersey is a problem. The road is desired greatly by the Baltimore & Ohio, but it is admitted that the commission may allocate it to the New York Central, with some concession to the Baltimore & Ohio. The Baltimore & Ohio is eager to get the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburgh also, but it is regarded as possible that the commission may award it jointly to the Baltimore & Ohio and the Wabash.

Railroad observers seem to think that the commission will aim to satisfy the greatest possible number of railroads. Thus the plan, it is understood now, will favor the ambitions of the Baltimore & Ohio, the Chesapeake & Ohio and the Wabash, although not in their entirety. The same applies to the Northwestern merger aims.

BEAR MARKET AHEAD?

For months the American Institute of Finance constantly warned its clients, cautioned them and repeatedly asked them to prepare for the inevitable readjustment ahead, from the senseless over-speculation that existed.

Now the "crash" has come, now even sound securities have lost close to 50% of their peak prices.

WHAT'S AHEAD?

With this drastic general readjustment, can we now look forward to a substantial and sustained recovery?

Or, have the heavy losses in the stock market, coincident with the declining trend in business, crippled purchasing power to a sufficient extent to bring a slower, but nevertheless a persistent, downward movement?

These questions are answered, specific recommendations given to aid in conditions ahead, in a NEW Advisory Bulletin, just issued. Copies have been reserved for distribution, FREE.

Simply ask for FREE Bulletin NTD-8.

ENDURING FINANCIAL RECORDS

A limited number of copies of The New York Times each day are printed on imperishable rag paper which will last indefinitely in files. Banks and business houses that place their announcements in The New York Times will have the assurance that their advertisements appearing in the newspaper preferred for such announcements will also be a permanent record.

PRICES IRREGULAR ON CURB EXCHANGE

Some of the Leaders Advance While Others React Under Profit-Taking.

OIL STOCKS ARE FIRMER

Illinois Pipe, Chesebrough and Gulf Show Gains—American Cyanamid B Declines.

Trading was erratic on the New York Curb Exchange yesterday, some of the utilities and investment trusts continuing to advance while a few other leaders reacted under profit-taking. The oils were firmer in tone, Illinois Pipe, Gulf Oil, Chesebrough Manufacturing, and a few others rising briskly.

In the utility section American and Foreign Power warrants, Electric Power and Light warrants, American Gas and Electric, Empire Power, Eastern States Power B, Electric Bond and Share, Commonwealth Edison, Southwest Gas Utilities, United Corporation warrants, United Gas and United Light and Power A gained. National Public Service A, Hydroelectric Securities and a few others declined.

American Cyanamid B moved lower, while Amrad Corporation, Ford of Canada A, Marine Midland, St. Regis Paper, Silica Gel, Taggart Corporation and G. & W. Walker gained. In the investment trust section American Investors B, Goldman Sachs, Graymur Corporation, Haygart Corporation, Prudential Investors, Reliance Management, Third National Investors, Transamerica, Utility Equities and Utility and Industrials improved.

The Test of Four Great Financial Crises

Mr. Louis Guenther will publish in the forthcoming issue of The Financial World the first of a series of articles, outlining a broad and sound investment program, that has stood the test of all conditions, depressions, crises and major declines in the security markets.

These vital articles will demonstrate, by 48 outstanding examples, how investors in America's basic and progressive enterprises have been able to realize from 10 to 15 per cent per annum, and even more, over a period of thirty years. These three decades included four major crises—1903-1907-1914 and 1920.

Investors should read these informative articles, since they will aid them in formulating a sound investment method. A copy of the Dec. 11th issue, containing the first of this series, will be sent free on request.

WILL WIDEN INQUIRY INTO EXTRA FARES

Commerce Commission Orders Investigation of Special Rates on Railroads.

SEVERAL CARRIERS NAMED

Questions of Discrimination and Prejudice to Be Taken Up by Examiners.

The Interstate Commerce Commission last week gave notice that it intended to broaden its investigation into the charging of extra fares on passenger trains in addition to the regular passenger and Pullman fares and surcharges. The inquiry affects these special rates between New York and Chicago and other points. It is now possible on some through trains from New York to Chicago to travel to intermediate points at less proportionate cost than between New York and Chicago. Charging of a fare for a journey greater than the sum of the fares between intermediate points on that journey is counter to the laws affecting interstate commerce.

Among the railroads named in the commission's investigation are the New York Central, the Pennsylvania, the Lackawanna and the Erie. The regions affected are covered between points in the New England Freight Association, the Trunk Line Association, the Central Freight Association and contiguous points. Hearings will begin in Chicago on Feb. 17 before Examiners Worthington and Boat.

The commission last week announced a series of queries which it is making relative to the extra train fares. It is inquiring as to the basis on which extra fares are computed, the difference in services on extra fare trains and ordinary trains, the revenues derived from extra fares in 1912, 1919, 1926, 1927 and 1928, and the cost of operating extra fare trains compared with the cost of operating ordinary trains. The railroads are asked also to state whether prejudice or discrimination results from the operation of extra fare trains.

Other information asked is the number of trains between all points upon which extra fares are charged, dates on which these fares were started, the amounts of these fares, the number of trains between these points on which no extra fares are charged, and the amount of these normal fares and the operating time schedule.

The contention of the railroads is that speed is of greater value to a person traveling from New York to Chicago than from New York to Buffalo. They argue that the run to Buffalo is overnight and that one or two hours does not make much difference, provided the passenger arrives there in time for business. They say it is not a difficult task to provide over-night service from New York to Buffalo, but that a greater service is performed in carrying the passenger from New York to Chicago in twenty hours and that the fast run to Chicago is therefore of more value than the intermediate run to Buffalo.

TEXAS & PACIFIC WINS OIL FIELD EXTENSION

Obtains I. C. C. Permit, Also Sought by Santa Fe, to Build in New Mexico.

The Texas & Pacific Railway won last week a contest with the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway as to which line should tap the rich Lea County oil fields of New Mexico. The Interstate Commerce Commission ruled that the Texas-New Mexico Railway, a subsidiary of the Texas & Pacific, be permitted to construct seventy miles of line from the Texas-New Mexico boundary to Lovington, N. M. The South Plains & Santa Fé Railway, a subsidiary of the Santa Fé, was authorized to build forty-six miles of line from Seagraves to Lovington, N. M., but not, as it had desired, to build forty-three miles of line from Lovington southward.

The estimated cost of constructing the Texas-New Mexico extension was $1,825,000, and the cost of the entire proposed Santa Fé extension was estimated at $2,711,850. The report of the commission said that the difference in cost per mile resulted from different standards of construction and, perhaps, from different degrees of liberality and estimate. The area traveled by the Texas-New Mexico is not more favorable to cheap construction but is slightly rougher to the south, according to the report.

"Lea County comprises an area almost as large as the State of Connecticut," said the report, "which area is without any railroads. The absence of rail facilities has prevented the development of its large natural resources. The construction of both lines to Lovington would give access to the north and east, and also to the T. & P. on the south, which should be of advantage in the development of the territory. This would make unnecessary the construction of the Santa Fé's proposed branch."

GAIN IN AUTO ACCESSORIES.

Average Increase of 34.64 Per Cent in Manufacturers' Profits.

An average of the nine months' earnings of twenty-one manufacturers of automobile parts and accessories shows a gain of 34.64 per cent over the corresponding period last year. This year's aggregate for the group was $48,171,218, while that of last year was $35,778,262.

The table, prepared by Ernst & Ernst, accountants, follows:

MERCHANTS SKEPTICAL OF 125TH ST. RAIL PLAN

Fear More Transit Congestion and Query Financing in Extension of New York & Boston Road.

Expressing the fear that the extension of the New York, Westchester & Boston Railroad under the Harlem River along the line of 125th Street would have the effect of adding to congestion rather than of relieving it, the Merchants' Association after a study of the problem, has withheld approval of this project.

The study of the association was undertaken by its committee on city transit after the Harlem Board of Commerce had asked support of efforts to extend the railroad to a terminus in 125th Street.

"The Harlem Board of Commerce has requested this association to support a project for extending the New York, Westchester and Boston Railway under the Harlem River and westward along the line of 125th Street in a subway," the report said. "It is claimed that this project would bring about better distribution of the commuter traffic to and from Westchester and would bring substantial relief to the congestion in the Grand Central Zone.

"Your committee on city transit is of the opinion that this project is practical from a physical engineering viewpoint, but finds it neither fully worked out in its financial aspects, nor desirable in its probable effects upon the rapid transit situation within New York City.

"If this project is to be financed by the railroad company it would necessitate a substantial increase in commuter and other fares. If it is to be financed by the city, the greatest care should be exercised in the details of the contract, but nothing is set forth in the statement of the Harlem Board of Commerce on this most important point.

"From the rapid transit viewpoint, the chief weakness in this project is that it purposes to introduce several thousand more passengers into the Manhattan rapid transit lines in the zone of maximum loading. To your committee the rapid transit lines appear to need relief in this zone more than the Grand Central territory.

"Your committee recommends that the association take no action upon this matter."

REPORTS RAILROADS RESPONSIVE TO HOOVER

President of the Lackawanna Says They Will Not Curtail Plans Made for Expansion.

President Hoover called on a unit of the country's industry that has one of the largest of aggregate purchasing powers when he asked the railroads to help in maintaining prosperity, it was announced yesterday by J. M. Davis, president of the Lackawanna Railroad. Mr. Davis said that sometimes railroads may defer large expenditures if they feel that circumstances do not warrant them, and that Mr. Hoover's action had caused the carriers not to curtail expansion about which, in view of the decrease in railroad earnings in the final quarter of the year, they might have been undecided.

"The railroads buy 28 per cent of the steel used in the country," said Mr. Davis. "They use about 25 per cent of the timber, about 24 per cent of the copper and from 27 to 30 per cent of the coal produced in the country. There is hardly a commodity from soap to asbestos that they do not use.

"Replacement of railroad ties each year provides a large market for timber. Copper and brass fittings, brass journals and the telegraph and telephone services maintained by the railroads require large quantities of copper.

"Because railroads have such a large mobilized purchasing power serves to explain why they were the group first called upon to affirm their faith in the country's prosperity. They will form one of the most important units in the organization of business leaders which in response to President Hoover's move will safeguard the welfare of the country."

P. & W. VA. FILES BRIEF.

Replies in Fight of P. R. R. on Connellsville Branch.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP).—Opposition by the Pennsylvania Railroad to the petition of the Pittsburgh & West Virginia Railway to construct a branch line connecting with the Donora Southern was attacked today by the applicant in a brief filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It contended that its proposed line from the Connellsville extension to serve the town of Donora was necessary and held that the Connellsville line would not have been built but for a substantial volume of Donora and Monessen traffic assured to it.

"To now deprive it of this traffic," the brief said, "by refusing to allow it to make minor construction necessary to physically reach Monongahela River valley municipalities would not only make the Connellsville extension unprofitable of operation but would place upon the present Pittsburgh & West Virginia Railway Company what might well prove to be an unsupportable burden."

NEW COMPANIES FORMED.

One With $10,000,000 Capitalization to Deal in Stocks and Bonds.

DOVER, Del., Dec. 7 (AP).—A charter was filed at the State Department today by the Oleoke Corporation to deal in stocks and bonds. The corporation is capitalized at $10,000,000. Incorporators are William H. Stevens, Harry C. Rand and Michael A. Castaldi of New York City.

A charter was filed also by the American Chain Hotel and Apartment Corporation to operate hotels and apartment houses. It is capitalized at $5,000,000 and 200,000 shares of no-par value. The incorporators are S. L. Mackey, J. Skrivan and H. Kennedy of Wilmington.

An amendment to its charter was filed by the Sunray Oil Corporation of New York, increasing its capital stock from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000.

Promoted by Southern Pacific.

Carroll R. Harding, engineer of standards for the Southern Pacific Company, has been appointed assistant to the president. Mr. Harding has devoted his railroad career to the Southern Pacific. He is supervising construction of the $12,000,000 Suisun Bay bridge and chairman of the maintenance of way standardization committee and the committee on insurance.

Nipissing Announces Find on Hudson Bay—New Auditing System for Exchange in Toronto.

Special to The New York Times.

TORONTO, Ont., Dec. 7.—Oscar Hudson & Co. have been appointed auditors for the Standard Stock and Mining Exchange here and will supervise brokers' audits, which will take the place of the old system. In future the members' books will be audited under the direction of the Exchange auditor. Directors of the Exchange have approved a list of firms which will audit the members' books and report to the supervising firm. The work is now progressing, the audit under the new system having started last week.

The Exchange has heretofore had audits received from the members themselves every June and December. From now on audits may be taken at any time, so long as they are made at least twice a year. The new system is accepted as another step in the protection of the trading public and tends to reveal the position of the various brokerage houses. The supervising auditor will submit any members' audits to the directors of the Exchange that may be considered necessary.

The Department of Railways and Mines for the Province of Quebec has issued the report of mining operations for 1928. The report opens with a short review of mining operations and gives figures demonstrating the progress made by the province in the development of its mineral resources.

Quebec Production Up 28 Per Cent.

The total value of production of mines and quarries reached in 1928 $37,325,207, an increase of $2,201,177, or 28 per cent as compared with 1927.

The mineral production for 1928 is listed under three main headings: non-metallic, not including building materials, $12,058,974, or 32.4 per cent; building materials (stone, brick, lime, cement, sand), $17,139,161, or 45.8 per cent; metallics, $8,127,132, or 21.8 per cent.

A rich pocket of gold has been discovered at Term Point on the west coast of Hudson Bay, north of Mistake Bay, by the Nipissing Mining Company. In July last the company sent a large prospecting party into the district. About 700 pounds of rock were sent out from Term Point to the company's mill at Cobalt and this quantity yielded about $10,000 worth of ore, according to information just revealed.

McIntyre Porcupine's net earnings for the quarter ended on Sept. 30 were $529,251.16, as shown by a statement accompanying the dividend check. The quarterly and half-yearly earnings statement follows:

	2d Quarter. Sept. 30, 1929.	6 Mos. to Sept. 30, 1929.
Gross income	$1,112,861	$2,175,472
Costs, including development	583,610	1,176,109
Net earnings	529,251	999,363
Less provision for taxes	30,888	59,820
Net earnings before depreciation	498,362	939,542

Heavy Equipment for Mines.

Due to the successful transport of a large tonnage of equipment, Howey Gold Mines, Ltd., is far ahead of schedule. Included in the shipments, which were made by large barges supplemented by railroad over the portages, were heavy pieces of machinery, one of which alone weighed seventeen tons. All freight had to be transported across the portage at Ear Falls and then reloaded into scows with a capacity of less than one-eighth that of the scows on Lac Seul. Much care had to be exerted in loading the scows on the northern portion of the run to avoid foundering on Pack Wash, Gull and Keg Lakes. These lakes, on account of sudden squalls, are very treacherous to navigate.

Fred M. Connell and associates have taken two options on Muriel Lake copper claims, seventeen miles north of the Canadian National Railway at a point eleven miles west of Nakina in the Kowkash division, it was officially announced today. Options taken are on the Brookbanks group of nine claims and the Holland group of eighteen claims. The discovery appears to be of importance, the samples assaying high in copper and carrying silver and gold. The properties are now being examined by Mr. Connell's engineers.

Acquires Claims in Nova Scotia.

Directors of the Aconda Mining Company officially announced today that the company had acquired a group of fifty-seven claims in the gold-borer section of Nova Scotia, immediately adjoining the Locarno copper mines on the north. It also was said that as a result of new developments, there was a possibility that the company would again resume work on its holdings in the Reuyn Field. The Nova Scotia property acquires is so situated that it covers a large part of the north leg of the anticlinical axis, which runs through this section and has attracted considerable interest among mining men.

Developments on the Errington mine of Treadwell Yukon at Sudbury have been important in the last four months, according to an official who has just returned from one of his periodical visits. There is not only one ore system or ore lens carrying good grade of ore, but actually four parallel ore systems stretching in the general sweep of the Vermilion Lake structure.

DOHERTY & CO. SUED.

Iowa Woman Asks Return of $119 Paid Bankers on Stock.

DES MOINES, Iowa, Dec. 7 (AP).—Alleged failure of Henry L. Doherty & Co., New York investment bankers, to register under the new Iowa securities law until Sept. 27, 1929, is the basis for a suit for recovery of $119 paid for stock filed against them today by attorneys for Mrs. Anna G. Davidson of Des Moines.

The petition charges the firm sold ten shares of Cities Service common stock to Mrs. Davidson at $51.50 a share on Sept. 2, three weeks before it qualified under the Iowa securities law. Mrs. Davidson asks judgment for $119, the amount she paid on the stock, together with interest and attorneys' fees. Cities Service stock closed on the New York Curb today at 30⅞.

Joseph Brody, one of her attorneys, estimates that the legality of $5,000,000 worth of Cities Service stock held by residents of the State might be questioned if Mrs. Davidson's suit is upheld.

TWO TAKE OWN LIVES AFTER PLUM FAILURE

Danish Company Director and Cashier Found Dead—Judicial Inquiry Continues.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

COPENHAGEN, Dec. 7.—The judicial inquiry regarding the recent failures of Plum companies is causing a growing number of arrests of persons concerned in the various companies connected with the Plum group.

Today brought two more suicides since the organizer of the whole affair, Harald Plum, took his life.

Director T. C. Thomassen was summoned to attend the inquiry to give explanations of certain transactions of the Le Brun Butter Company. He did not appear and it eventually transpired that Mr. Thomassen had committed suicide.

He had been a personal friend of Plum for many years and had been connected with the butter company for forty-five years.

The judge who is conducting the inquiries today decided that in future if witnesses did not attend he would immediately send police to detain them.

Cashier Houlsen, who disappeared dramatically yesterday because, it is alleged, of defalcations exceeding $250,000 in the Gjovik branch of the Bank of Norway, was found dead this morning with a revolver beside him.

ROCKEFELLER OPENS NOVEL APARTMENTS

Completes $2,000,000 Building in Tarrytown to Be Completely Owned by the Tenants.

Special to The New York Times.

TARRYTOWN, N. Y., Dec. 7.—John D. Rockefeller Jr.'s latest accomplishment to relieve the housing situation, the Van Tassel apartments in North Tarrytown, completed and ready today for tenants, is a novel venture.

The apartment house was constructed in collaboration with the Chamber of Commerce of Tarrytown at a cost of about $2,000,000. It is a five-story structure built in the form of a rectangle with 241 apartments of three to six rooms, the rental ranging from $65 to $125 a month. The building has no fire escapes and no elevators, it being fireproof in every respect. Each apartment is sound proof and contains all modern conveniences.

Probably the most novel feature of the plan is the cooperative system of occupant ownership. The tenants will be obliged to purchase shares of stock in the owner corporation which eventually will make each occupant a partial owner of the apartment. The minimum number of shares allotted is ten at $20 a share. The maximum depends on the size of the apartment.

Mr. Rockefeller plans to turn the building over to the tenants in 1945 for the $800,000 which will have been paid by them up to that time.

NAME TWO TO EXPAND GIRL SCOUT PROGRAM

Miss Gunther, Former Columbia Teacher, and Miss Leahy Chosen as Secretaries.

The appointment of two New York women executives to head two of the four divisions provided under the terms of the five-year development plan of the Girl Scouts was announced yesterday at Girl Scout national headquarters, 670 Lexington Avenue.

The women are Emma H. Gunther, formerly of the professional staff of Teachers College, Columbia University, who will serve as executive secretary of the program division, and Agnes Berkeley Leahy, formerly of the Personnel Research Federation, who will be executive secretary of the personnel division.

The appointments, it was stated, were the first steps toward putting the five-year development plan into operation. The plan, adopted by unanimous vote of 400 delegates at the fifteenth annual convention in New Orleans recently, seeks to increase membership in the organization from 200,000 to 500,000 by 1935 and to place the national organization on a practically self-supporting basis.

MILLER DONATES SERVICES.

Ex-Governor Refuses State Fee for Help in Budget Case Appeal.

Former Governor Nathan L. Miller, who represented the office of the Attorney General in the budget case before the Court of Appeals, gave his services to the State without charge, Attorney General Hamilton Ward announced yesterday.

Being an authority on constitutional law, Mr. Miller was deeply interested in the case and volunteered his services. As the case progressed, he devoted much time to it, and eventually participated in the argument before the Appeals bench.

"Mr. Miller performed a most valuable service and is to be congratulated," Mr. Ward said. "The case took a great deal of his time. In refusing a fee he has added further to this public service."

Mr. Miller cooperated with Solicitor General Claude G. Dawes in the preparation of the case. The office of Governor Roosevelt was represented by William D. Guthrie and Edward H. Griffin.

FOR GRADING DYESTUFFS.

German Expert Addresses American Textile Chemists.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 7.—International adoption of a plan for the grading of dyestuffs as worked out by the German commission was urged by Dr. Paul Krais, director of the German Textile Research Institute, at the annual meeting of the American Association of Textile Chemists and Colorists here today.

Dr. Krais said that colors of varying light fastness should be designated by roman numerals ranging from I to VIII in an ascending scale. He disapproved all artificial light-testing.

Dr. George L. Clark of the University of Illinois discussed the X-ray diffraction methods involving in the latest technique of study of the structure of textile fibres.

Dr. E. H. Killheffer of Passaic was elected president of the association.

ASKS CITY TO EASE COMMUTER TRAVEL

L. S. Miller, Westchester Rail Head, Shows Increase in Riders From Suburbs.

CALLS THEM CUSTOMERS

Inadequate Transit May Cause Loss of Their Trade, He Declares, at Port Chester Line Opening.

Special to The New York Times.

PORT CHESTER, N. Y., Dec. 7.—Leverett S. Miller, president of the New York, Westchester & Boston Railway, urged greater cooperation here tonight by New York City in supplying adequate transit facilities to distribute properly the daily rush of commuters.

Mr. Miller spoke at a dinner in connection with the opening of the extension of the New York, Westchester & Boston Railway from Rye to this village. The first train, arriving here at about 4 o'clock this afternoon, was cheered by a large crowd, including many local officials.

Regular twenty-four-hour service to New York City, the first all-day and all-night commuter service for this village, began at midnight.

Says City Is Responsible.

"I have always maintained," Mr. Miller said, "that the City of New York was responsible for properly distributing the commuters brought within the city by the suburban lines. The situation reminds me of an hourglass. We who operate the carriers cannot afford to distribute our passengers through the city. The city alone can handle the situation. It is in a position to know what should be done and to do it."

Mr. Miller said the Westchester Railway carried 2,800,000 passengers in 1913, and more than 14,000,000 in 1928. The population of Westchester County, he said, had increased in twenty-nine years from 184,000 to 475,000 and that it was estimated that by 1960 there would be more than 1,000,000 persons living in Westchester.

"At present there are about 43,000,000 yearly riders in and out of New York City from the Westchester County section—21,500,000 individuals," Mr. Miller continued. "If you figure that each spends $2 a day while in New York, that means $43,000,000 spent by these Westchesterites in the city, largely in Manhattan. Take the total of the daily riders from the metropolitan district and you will find that they probably spend in Manhattan in the neighborhood of $180,000,000 a year.

Cites Economic Factor.

"This is a tidy sum and should be taken as an endorsement of the city's extensive program for the further development of transit lines and should impress upon officials having such matters in hand the need for further developing those plans so that the daily commuters to Manhattan can be conveniently taken to and from their destinations.

"The present situation may be likened to a big department store which failed to provide sufficient aisles and elevators for its patrons to have convenient access to the goods displayed. It would certainly not be up to those patrons to pay directly or lend their credit for these facilities. Dam up water and it will eventually seek other channels.

"I am wondering, if the city does not furnish adequate and convenient facilities for the distribution of the daily riders through the city generally and not along one or two highways, whether eventually the city may not lose a large part of this trade."

Other speakers included Surrogate George A. Slater, William A. Cokely, treasurer of the Bronx Chamber of Commerce; Bradley A. Dusenbury, president of the local Chamber of Commerce; Mayor John Morchead of Rye, and Mayor Halsey J. Munson of Port Chester.

GRANT STORES PROTEST CHRISTMAS GOODS BAR

Ordered to Post $5,000 Bond in Propp Suit Over Tree Lighting Outfits.

The statement that 14,000,000 Christmas tree lighting outfits are sold annually was made yesterday by I. Gainsburg, attorney for the M. Propp Company, Inc., one of the largest manufacturers of these outfits, in connection with a suit by that company against the W. T. Grant Company, Inc., a chain store concern. Supreme Court Justice Wasservogel had granted a temporary injunction restraining the Grant company from selling lighting outfits equipped with a green cord interspersed with red dots. The suit is based on the ground that the green cord with the red dots is the Propp company's trade-mark, registered in 1925.

When the case came before Justice Mitchell on Friday on an application by the Propp company to continue the injunction pending the trial, Carl J. Austrian, in behalf of the Grant company, asked to have the action transferred to the Federal Court on the ground that the defendant is a foreign corporation. The application was granted and the case was then argued before District Judge Knox. The defendant's attorney said that the Grant company has $100,000 tied up in the enjoined sets and had quit selling them in 250 stores, although 10,000 sets a day could be sold. He said that to continue the restraining order over the Christmas season would mean a loss more severe than any damage the Propp company might sustain because of the alleged trade-mark violation.

Judge Knox decided that the plaintiff would be amply protected if the defendant gave a bond for $5,000 pending the trial.

REPORTS RETAIL TRADE DROP.

New England Department Store Sales Under Year Ago.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Dec. 6.—Although business continues reactionary in New England, it is pointed out by the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston in its Dec. 1 bulletin that the declining tendency has been less pronounced than in the country as a whole, due mainly to the fact that this section is not directly influenced by changes in automobiles and steel.

Building operations locally are slightly more active. Contracts awarded in the week ended Dec. 3 were not only larger than in previous weeks of the current year but in excess of the corresponding week in previous years. Increased activity is reported in leather tanneries, indicating an early resumption of activity in shoe-manufacturing plants. Orders for Spring delivery of shoes are coming in satisfactorily.

The textile industry is dull, although a better demand is reported for cotton goods. Retail trade is somewhat disappointing. The volume of business decreased with dry goods and men's furnishing jobbers. Manufacturers of men's and women's clothing report business quiet.

There is a slightly better demand for furs, but the volume is below expectations. Department store sales are somewhat under a year ago, and specialty shops report a smaller volume of business. Sales of wholesale jewelry for the year to date are 5 per cent over last year, and December sales so far have run better than a year ago.

RETAIL TRADE INCREASES.

Buyers in Philadelphia Area, However, Avoid Luxuries.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 6.—Each week retail business in this section increases, and the volume compares well with a year ago. Aside from toys, demand turns more than usual to merchandise regarded as necessary. Streets and department stores are thronged with shoppers.

Cold weather, ice and snow checked many building operations which were not under cover.

While railroad traffic is fairly heavy, it is running somewhat below last year, but extra men are still employed to operate freight trains. Loadings of coke and merchandise are above last year.

In most lines industries are operating at a normal rate for the season. The customary year-end slackening is noted in steel operations, but no word of discouragement is heard in the trade, as hopes are running high for a revival next year.

Encouraged by lower prices, the demand for radio sets has sharply improved over that of November.

Credit is abundant, banks having an abundance of loanable funds available at 5½ per cent.

In the steel trade it is figured that this year's gain in production over last year is about 10 per cent, compared with an average gain of 3 per cent for the five preceding years. Rail orders are about 50 per cent above this time last year.

WHOLESALE TRADE SPOTTY.

Irregularity Is Noted in Chicago Area but Retailers Prosper.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Ill., Dec. 6.—A very heavy volume of retail trade in the larger department stores was contrasted this week with a tendency to irregularity in the wholesale and manufacturing lines.

Street car passengers—a good index of shopping conditions—broke all records for a Monday at the beginning of the week, while the fares carried later were in excess of the similar week a year ago. High-priced luxury articles were neglected as gifts.

The annual December market week among the wholesalers closed with a volume of individual orders equal to last year, but the size of the orders was a little smaller, suggesting caution on the part of visiting retailers.

Semi-official forecasts of earnings for local motor accessory factories indicate they have suffered heavily from the automotive reaction.

Competition is very keen among tanners and price cutting to get leather orders is carried to an extreme.

Building permits for November were 23 per cent below a year ago in value, while the number of permits taken out during the first week of December continued sharply below normal.

A survey released by the Chicago Real Estate Board showed the percentage of vacancies of all classes of stores and dwellings within the city limits to be only 4.7 per cent, but this failed to include conditions in apartment hotels, where the vacancy ratio is believed to average decidedly higher.

RETAIL TRADE STAYS BRISK.

Stores in Fifth District Call for Additional Clerks.

Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, Va., Dec. 6.—Announcement that the Chesapeake and Potomac telephone companies, operating in Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia and the District of Columbia, will spend $22,000,000 on plant developments in 1930 was made today by President Lloyd B. Wilson.

Retail trade in the fifth district continues brisk and stores in the larger cities are advertising for additional help for the holiday trade. Shopping this week has been stimulated by the distribution of Christmas savings clubs' checks. The monthly report of the Fifth Reserve Bank for October shows excellent conditions in business, industry and agriculture. Employment was also reported good.

Textile operations alone were reported weak, although cotton consumption in October was greater than in October, 1928.

BIG ATLANTA BANKS MERGE.

The Citizens and Southern Now Has Resources of $85,000,000.

Special to The New York Times.

ATLANTA, Ga., Dec. 6.—Financial interest in Atlanta this week centred in the purchase of the Atlanta Trust Company by the Citizens and Southern Bank, making the second big deal of the Fall, the first being the merger of the Atlanta and Lowry and the Fourth National Bank.

The purchase gives the Citizens and Southern control of about $85,000,000, with total deposits of approximately $81,000,000. The building obtained by the Citizens and Southern in the deal is valued at $1,000,000.

Stockholders of the Atlantic Ice and Coal Company this week authorized the sale of the company to the Southeastern Ice and Utilities Company, a J. P. Morgan interest. Holders of the present common stock of the local firm will receive one share of Class A stock and one share of Class D stock of the Southeastern organization for every share of common now held by them.

Twelve Georgia business firms have reported during the last fiscal year benefits of $607,000 from services of the Fereral branch office in Atlanta of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. Since the report was made, one Atlanta firm alone obtained a $200,000 order through the aid of the bureau.

A campaign to establish Atlanta as the marketing centre of the Southeast has just been started, following the completion of arrangements whereby a two and one-half million dollar office building, cold storage plant and warehouse will be erected on the site of the present Union Station, which gives way soon to a new station on another location. Work on the new building is to start as soon as the new station is completed.

GENERAL BUSINESS HOLDS UP.

Industries Quieter in Eight Districts but Retail Sales Increase.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. LOUIS, Dec. 6.—While industries have slowed down, particularly automobile plants, general business in the Eighth Federal Reserve District continues at a fairly satisfactory level. Cold weather has quickened the sale of seasonal goods, and retail stores report good sales with a constant increase for the holidays. It is now believed that the holiday trade will be excellent.

Shoe manufacturers report good prospects with the dull season on hand. The International Shoe Company announces an increase in dividend.

Iron and steel plants have prospects of orders from railroads, but the activity at mills and foundries has been considerably lower than in previous months.

Decline in prices of farm products has weakened the demand for farm implements, and because of the heavy snows trade from rural centres has been light.

BUILDING PERMITS DOUBLED.

Over $87,000,000 Will Be Spent in Kansas City District in 1930.

Special to The New York Times.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Dec. 6.—More than $87,000,000 will be spent in and around Kansas City on construction projects in 1930, according to a new survey of the industrial department of the Kansas City Chamber of Commerce.

Building permits in November in Kansas City totaled $3,000,000, or twice as much as a year ago.

Postal receipts in November were $879,101, compared with $923,821 a year ago. Bank clearings for November were $615,000,000, or 6 per cent larger than a year ago.

No changes of importance were shown in the weekly statement of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank, except total clearings for the district, which totaled $195,000,000, $39,000,000 less than in the preceding week and $9,000,000 less than a year ago.

Bills discounted showed only a slight increase, and gold reserves decreased only slightly.

BANK DEPOSITS HOLD UP.

Business Generally in the Southwest Is Good.

Special to The New York Times.

DALLAS, Texas, Dec. 6.—Business in the eleventh Federal Reserve district continues somewhat above the volume of 1928. Both retail and wholesale trade shows an increase over 1928, and merchants say their 1929 totals should be well over the totals for last year. There is a distinctly optimistic feeling throughout the district.

Bank deposits throughout the district do not reflect any shrinkage on account of stock market transactions, but on the other hand, all banks are shown to be in a very healthy condition. Check transactions, too, are unusually large. The total for the week ended Thursday in Dallas was in excess of $100,000,000.

Building operations and public improvements show a big increase. President Hoover's plan for rehabilitation through encouragement of public improvements has brought immediate results here. Estimates made by Governor Moody and other recognized authorities indicate that more than $400,000,000 will be spent on building and other improvements in Texas during the coming year.

These building operations already are taking up the surplus of unemployment, and are giving a decidedly optimistic feeling to business in general.

FARM MACHINERY IN DEMAND.

Manufacturers in Wheat Belt Predict Record Season.

Special to The New York Times.

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., Dec. 6.—Christmas trade in the Ninth District this month will be equal to and may exceed the 1928 volume, leading merchants and jobbers say. Buying already is brisk in representative centres, although in a few cities it was slightly under the 1928 figure to date. Stocks, however, are larger this year than last.

Building throughout the Ninth District has slumped over the same period last year, and the total for the year will be below the 1928 figure. Lumber and building material sales are expected to show considerable gain after the first of the year, with several building projects already announced to start in the first few months of 1930.

The total volume of business in the district during the last ten-day period, as measured by debits to individual accounts, was slightly above last year's, although the increase was very small, some cities reporting decreases.

Industrial activity is continuing on a greater scale than a year ago, with the greatest production reported by manufacturers of farm machinery and tractors. They expect one of the greatest seasons in Northwest history during 1930, with an increase in export trade.

Commercial loans of city banks are greater now than a year ago, but are declining. Investment holdings of banks, however, are below last year. Borrowings of city banks from the Federal Reserve Bank are larger than a year ago.

FORECASTS CAR LOADINGS GAIN

Pacific Coast Board Predicts Moving of More Commodities.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 6.—A forecast on car loadings for this district covering the first quarter of 1930 made by the Pacific Coast Transportation Advisory Board, indicated that underlying conditions are good. An increase in the movement of principal commodities is predicted.

The only commodities expected to show a decrease from the first quarter of 1929 are cement, hay, minerals and canned goods, steel, iron, petroleum, vegetables, dairy products, poultry products and sugar are expected to show increases.

At a meeting held last Friday it was reported that power companies in California would spend $82,200,

TRADE GAINS SEEN BY RESERVE BANKS

Bulletins for Dec. 1 Review the Period of the Slump in the Stock Markets.

SOME RECESSIONS NOTED

Favorable Factors, However, Outnumber the Unfavorable in Various Districts.

The detailed reports of the Federal Reserve Banks of the various districts are particularly interesting because of the fact that the December bulletins, most of which now are at hand, cover the period of the break in the stock market during October and November.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, in its December bulletin, said that manufacturing industries of the district report an aggregate loss of 1.1 per cent of employment for the period from Sept. 15 to Oct. 15, and that this represents practically the first decline in industrial employment of the district since January. Building and construction work were maintained at about the level of a month previous, while distributers' industries made some additions to their forces. A gain of 3 per cent was reported in department store sales over the previous month. Trading in Chicago, Milwaukee and smaller centres showed improvement, while totals for Indianapolis and Detroit were smaller.

The Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis said:

"Reports relative to trade and industry reflected no marked changes as compared with the previous preceding several months, although in some lines decreases took place in production and primary distribution. Purchasing of both raw and finished materials was conducted along more conservative and cautious lines than earlier in the year, particularly since the final week of October. Sales of department stores in the principal cities in October showed a decrease of 2.4 per cent, as compared with the same month last year. Wholesalers investigated report advance ordering of holiday goods below expectations. In virtually all lines there is a well defined disposition to hold production and inventories in close relation with actual market requirement."

Improvement at Kansas City.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City said in its Dec. 1 bulletin that department stores reported a rising volume of retail trade for the season and that sales for October were larger than a year ago. Distributive trade for wholesale firms was in about the same volume as in September, but below a year ago.

Commercial loans at reporting member banks continued to rise and by Nov. 6 had attained a new high record, while security loans fell and were considerably below amounts outstanding one year ago. Debits by banks to individual accounts for the five weeks ended Nov. 6 reflected increases of 7.7 per cent over the corresponding five weeks last year, and the accumulative total for the year to Nov. 6 was the greatest volume of money paid by checks for any trade of forty-five weeks.

The Richmond Federal Reserve Bank thus summed up conditions:

"There are some troublesome spots in the district and some industries are not doing as well as others, but favorable factors are more numerous than unfavorable. Member bank loans are lower than a year ago, and for the first time in many months loans on securities are lower those outstanding twelve months earlier.

"Member banks in the district are borrowing more from the Federal Reserve than at this time last year, but the increase is in country bank borrowing, chiefly for agricultural purposes. On the whole, agricultural returns in the district are better this year than last, with cotton the only outstanding exception."

Situation in New England.

The December review of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston said: "New England industry is not directly influenced by changes in two of the basic industries of the country, automobile production and iron and steel production, both of which reflected reductions in output during October. The fact that general business activity in the aggregate has remained at a higher level quite steadily throughout the greater part of the year seems to indicate that industry is well diversified in New England.

"Factors which have been sustaining influences this year are electric power production, merchandise and miscellaneous carloadings, shoe production, wool consumption, allied metal trades and the activity necessary in catering to the recreational features of New England.

"The total current value awarded for contracts on new building in New England in October was larger than in September, but less than in October a year ago."

GETS QUEBEC TIMBER AREA.

Canadian International Paper Takes Over More Than 64 Square Miles.

FREDERICTON, N. B., Dec. 7 (Canadian Press).—One of the largest transfers of timber rights to be made in connection with the pulp and paper industry of New Brunswick was consummated in Montreal this week. The deal, for which the price was not stated, was the transfer of the holdings of the Escuminac Lumber Company on the Escuminac River, Bonaventure County, Que., to the Canadian International Paper Company.

The transfer involves sixty-four square miles of heavily timbered leasehold land and a small area of freehold. The location of the property, which is directly across Bay Chaleur, near Dalhousie, N. B., gives foundation to the report that the tract will supply the needs of the new pulp and paper mill in process of erection by the International at Dalhousie. Over 200,000,000 superficial feet are involved in the deal.

Directors of the Escuminac Lumber Company, Stanley Douglass, J. D. Richards, W. D. Gunter and H. Ralph Gunter, returned yesterday to their homes in Fredericton after putting through the transfer in Montreal. While there they conferred with Brig. Gen. J. B. White, vice president of the Canadian International.

For the past four years the Escuminac company cut long lumber on the property, operating two portable mills.

New Head for Rochester Gas.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Dec. 7 (AP.).—The election of Herman J. Russell of this city to the presidency of the Rochester Gas and Electric Corporation to succeed Robert M. Searle of Southold, L. I., who died last month, was announced here today. Mr. Russell has been executive vice president of the company since 1922.

Big Savings on Freight Cars By Efficiency of Railroads

More efficient use of freight cars since 1920 has meant the approximate saving of $750,000,000 new capital, $45,000,000 on the cost of this capital, $30,000,000 in depreciation and $75,000,000 in repairs, according to John J. Bernet, president of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway. He said that every mile added to the daily average movement of freight cars was equivalent to the purchase of 100,000 new cars, and that since 1920 increased speed in freight movement had saved the purchase of 500,000 cars.

"All that money has gone back into the industrial, commercial and individual prosperity of the country," said Mr. Bernet. "The reduction in the turn-around time of the average freight car has saved shippers at least $50,000,000 interest. How many hundreds of millions of new capital and of interest has been saved by reducing the necessity of large inventories, nobody actually knows."

PAPER COMPANIES TO UNITE

Orono and Eastern Manufacturing, Both of Maine, Plan Merger.

BANGOR, Me., Dec. 7 (AP.).—Plans for merging the Eastern Manufacturing Company at Brewer and the Orono Pulp and Paper Company at Orono, both manufacturers of pulp and paper, were announced today by Edward N. Graham and Franklin E. Bragg, respective presidents of the concerns.

Plans call for Eastern Manufacturing to take over control of Orono if stockholders favor the merger. Directors of both have voted approval.

The companies were founded in 1889. Eastern Manufacturing, which maintains a plant also at Lincoln, has capitalization of $3,036,100 and surplus of $2,376,000. Orono is capitalized at $2,000,000 with surplus of $1,000,000. The Eastern company, for the nine months ended Sept. 20, reported total income of $1,090,000 and net of $167,000. The company was reorganized some time ago and its financial condition improved.

WILL HEAD BOARD OF TRADE.

J. A. Bunnell Chosen by Nominating Committee to Succeed Arnot.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Dec. 7.—John A. Bunnell, thrice president of the Chicago Board of Trade, is the selection of the nominating committee to succeed Samuel P. Arnot as head of the board for 1930. The nomination is tantamount to election. Mr. Bunnell has been in the packing business about thirty years. He was president in 1909, 1926 and 1927.

At the election on Jan. 6, the Board of Trade will choose a president, vice presidents, five directors and committees. Charles V. Essroger, vice president of the First National Bank, will advance from second to first vice president. Peter B. Carey, three times a director, has been nominated for a vice presidency.

PERMITS CHANGES IN STATE BANKS

Department in Albany Acts on Several Petitions—List of Authorizations Issued.

BRANCHES TO BE OPENED

Plans of Bank of the Manhattan Trust Company for Expansion Are Approved.

The Banking Department of the State of New York in Albany received last week several petitions for changes in institutions and acted on many of them.

The Bank of the Manhattan Trust Company was permitted to increase its capital stock from $1,000,000 to $22,250,000 and to change its official place of business from 52 Cedar Street to 40 Wall Street. Permission also was granted for it to take over the sixty-five branches heretofore occupied by the president and directors of the Manhattan Company, the banking business of which company is now being taken over by the Bank of the Manhattan Trust Company.

An authorization certificate was granted to the Globe Bank and Trust Company, with a capital of $1,250,000, at 815 Broadway, Brooklyn. This is a conversion of the Globe Exchange Bank.

The Banca Commerciale Italiana Trust Company was authorized to open a branch at 129 Mulberry Street.

The certified order granted at the Special Term of the Supreme Court in New York County on Oct. 31 declaring the Japanese Credit Union dissolved and its corporate existence terminated was filed.

The Chattel Loan Society of New York was authorized to open branches at 1 Hanson Place, Brooklyn, and 349 East 149th Street, the Bronx.

The petition of the Mortgage Bond Company to change its place of business from 58 Liberty Street to 120 Wall Street was granted.

The Interborough Personal Loan Company was authorized to change its place of business from 1,410 Avenue H, Brooklyn, to 1,423 Avenue I, Brooklyn.

Approval was granted to the Kings Highway Savings Bank's petition to move from the northeast corner of Kings Highway and East Sixteenth Street, Brooklyn, to the southeast corner of the same streets.

The petition of the United Loan Corporation to increase its capital stock from $100,000 to $200,000 was granted.

An authorization certificate was granted to the Union Credit Union, in the vicinity of Pitkin and Sutter Avenues, Brooklyn.

The Our Credit Union was permitted to change its place of business from 54 Irving Place to 45 East Twenty-fifth Street.

The Chemical Bank and Trust Company was authorized to open a branch banking and safe deposit office under the Chemical Safe Deposit Company at Lexington Avenue and Forty-ninth Street after discontinuing the branch at Lexington Avenue and Forty-seventh Street.

A branch of the Central Hanover Bank & Trust Company, to be located at 20 West Thirty-sixth Street pending the erection of a new building at Sixth Avenue and Thirty-fifth Street, was authorized.

Patrick J. McConnell of 76 Manhattan Avenue, was appointed bank examiner from a competitive list submitted by the State Civil Service Commission.

Edward J. Pierce of 1,674 East Thirty-sixth Street, Brooklyn, was appointed confidential stenographer in the New York office of the State Banking Department at a yearly salary of $2,000.

ERIE TURNS TO NOTES INSTEAD OF NEW STOCK

Railroad Does Not Believe Conditions Are Favorable for Share or Bond Flotation.

Evidence that railroad officials do not believe the market for new securities has improved sufficiently to make it a basis for new financing was afforded by the Erie Railroad last week, when it asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for permission to pledge $12,000,000 of its first consolidated mortgage, general lien, 4 per cent gold bonds as security for short-term notes.

"The applicant," said the petition, "has in the last few years made large expenditures for additions and betterments and for acquiring or retiring funded debt obligations, but because of the condition of the securities market since the Summer of 1928, applicant has been unable to capitalize such expenditures by the issuance and sale of securities.

"Because of such large expenditures made in 1928 and 1929 it is expected that it will soon be necessary for the applicant to do some temporary financing by the issuance of short-term notes in order to provide it with sufficient cash for corporate purposes and requirements and to provide it with necessary working capital until market conditions have sufficiently improved so as to make practicable the issuance and sale of long-term securities on favorable terms."

The petition said that in the first ten months of the year the Erie spent about $21,033,931 for capital purposes or for purposes not included in the income account. "Notwithstanding the strong financial position of the applicant during the past two years and at present," said the application, "which has enabled it to make $37,000,000 of capital expenditures and other expenditures, all capitalizable by the issuance and sale of long-term securities when such sale can be made on favorable terms, the applicant should be in a position to secure, if necessary, in the neighborhood of $10,000,000 by borrowing money on short-term notes."

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

NEW JERSEY UTILITY ADDS 18 BUS LINES

Schultz Companies Taken Over by Public Service Interstate Transportation

TO RAISE WORKERS' WAGES

New York-Philadelphia and New York-Atlantic City Routes Are Included in Deal.

Eighteen bus lines operated by twenty-one companies controlled by the Schultz interests in New Jersey and Pennsylvania will be taken over by the Public Service Interstate Transportation Company, subsidiary of the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey, on Jan. 1, it became known yesterday. The companies will be merged with the Public Service organization as fast as possible.

The New York-Philadelphia and New York-Atlantic City bus lines are among those involved. These and the other routes had been controlled hitherto by the O. G. Schultz Management, operating 264 buses and employing about 500 men. The other routes involved are the Williamstown, Clementona, Pitman, Mount Holly, Burlington, Haddonfield, Pensauken, Fairview, Barrington, Blackwood-Heislerville, Wildwood, Cape May, Berlin-Atco, Ocean City, Atlantic City and New York-Lakewood lines.

The Public Service Interstate Transportation Company announced that the present Public Service wage scale, which is higher than that paid by the Schultz companies, will be extended to cover employes of the companies taken over.

M. R. Boylan, vice president in charge of operation, said yesterday that "we feel that this action means a step forward in solving the South Jersey transit problem. It means an extension of the unified control that every one familiar with the situation believes to be essential to the provision of adequate service. It will permit further coordination, will avoid duplication of effort and will give opportunity for better direction of transit facilities."

Christmas Bonuses Announced.

All employes of Gertler, Devlet & Co., dealers in tax-exempt bonds, will receive Christmas bonuses ranging from four to ten weeks' salary, according to an announcement made by the firm yesterday.

ICE MERGER IS APPROVED.

Atlantic Stockholders Ratify Deal With Southeastern.

ATLANTA, Dec. 7 (AP.).—Stockholders of the Atlantic Ice and Coal Company have approved a plan of reorganization and the acquisition of the controlling interest by the Southeastern Ice Utilities Corporation of Virginia, it was announced here today.

Attorneys for both corporations were advised to complete legal details involving the issuance of 130,000 shares of Class A preference stock and 350,000 shares of Class B stock of no par value by the Atlantic Ice and Coal Company in addition to 50,000 shares of first preference stock now outstanding.

Southeastern Ice Utilities is to acquire 30,000 shares of the Class A stock of $50 par value and 250,000 shares of the Class B stock for $1,500,000, which will be used in retiring bonds of Atlantic Ice and Coal that will fall due on Jan. 1, 1930.

Holders of the present common stock of the Atlantic will receive one share of Class A stock and one share of Class B stock for each share of common stock they now hold.

Utilities to Spend $16,000,000.

The Georgia Power Company and its affiliated companies, the Columbus Electric and Power Company and the South Georgia Power Company, will spend $16,000,000 for new construction in Georgia in 1930, P. S. Arkwright, president, announced yesterday. This will be the largest amount ever expended for new construction in one year by any single enterprise in the history of the State.

WHEAT PRICES FALL, CLOSING AT BOTTOM

Argentine News, Although More Bullish, Loses Effect in Chicago Trading.

CORN IS DULL AND LOWER

Operations In Oats Quiet With Sympathetic Declines—Few Changes In Rye.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Dec. 7.—The wheat market was heavy in undertone most of today, with longs selling freely almost from the start. While commission-house buying started a strong rally at one time, the finish was at about the bottom, with net losses 2⅛ to 2½ cents. Argentine news has apparently lost its effect, and while an American observer in that country made an estimate of 143,000,000 bushels for the crop, or about 180,000,000 under that of last year, it attracted little attention. It suggests 63,000,000 bushels for export, the smallest estimate so far.

Argentina's markets were weak, with Buenos Aires 1⅛ to 1¾ cents lower and Rosario was off ⅝ to 1⅛ cents. Liverpool disappointed the trade by gaining only ¼ to ⅜ cent, virtually ignoring the upturn in North America yesterday. Good buying on the break was headed by strong local operators and commission houses and by holders of bids. After the market started down it showed little disposition to rally.

Export demand at the seaboard was slow, and no business was claimed except Japanese purchases of American grain at the Pacific Coast on Friday for January shipment. Statistics had little effect.

The Stanford Research Bureau was out with an estimate, showing minimum world's import requirements of 752,000,000 bushels, or 56,000,000 above Broomhall's recent figures, while a maximum of 848,000,000 bushels was indicated. Sentiment at the close was generally bearish.

Primary receipts today were 1,182,000 bushels; a week ago, 833,000, and a year ago, 1,201,000. Shipments, were 1,365,000 bushels; a week ago, 1,289,000, and a year ago, 1,087,000.

Corn was dull and somewhat easier in sympathy with wheat, closing ⅝ to 1 cent lower. The bulk of the trade was of local character, with fair support on the way down. Country offerings were larger, but sellers' ideas were ½ to 1 cent more than buyers would pay. The trade looks for a fairly good run next week unless weather conditions are unfavorable. Primary receipts were 1,098,000 bushels; a week ago, 1,173,000, and a year ago, 989,000. Shipments were 636,000 bushels; a week ago, 505,000, and a year ago, 589,000.

The oats market was quiet and trade mainly local, with futures off ⅛ to ½ cent at the close, in sympathy with other grains.

Little change occurred in the rye situation. While the Board of Trade will investigate the situation in the December delivery, longs generally showed no disposition to sell, and the close was ⅜ to 1 cent lower, in sympathy with wheat, with December showing the most strength.

Prices for the principal grains were as follows:

BRUSSELS HAS AUTO SHOW.

American Exhibits Particularly Impressive for Luxury.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BRUSSELS, Dec. 7.—The automobile salon opened in Brussels this afternoon, and visitors were particularly impressed by the luxury of the fittings displayed in American car exhibits.

The Socialist paper, The People, asks whether the price of American automobiles will be lowered as a result of the recent Wall Street crash. "The American Stock Exchange slump has rendered business difficult," the paper says, "and manufacturers are left with stocks on hand. They have not yet reduced their output. They will be faced with the necessity of getting rid of their stock at any price."

Largest Peat Power Plant.

What will be the largest power plant in the world using peat fuel is to be constructed on the Malaya Vsihera River, near Leningrad, according to the Economic Review of the Soviet Union. The ultimate capacity of the station will be 280,000 kilowatts, the initial capacity being half that figure. The annual consumption of peat by the plant is estimated at 1 760,000 metric tons.

Essential Oils Move Lower.

There was a downward trend in the prices of essential oils during the past week, the index number falling to 157.5 as compared with 159.6 the week before and 189.3 in the corresponding week last year, according to The Oil, Paint and Drug Reporter.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

Liquidation Depresses Futures —Reports From Mills and Jobbers Bearish.

MANUFACTURING COSTS UP

Unusual Amount of Waste Adds to Expense — Government's Crop Estimate Tomorrow.

After holding around previous closing levels during the greater part of yesterday's short session, prices on the Cotton Exchange were depressed by scattered liquidation and ended with a loss of 6 to 9 points. While operators expect some reduction tomorrow in the government's annual estimate of the crop, a disposition to even up outstanding interests brought contracts on the market. Reports of curtailment reaching 25 to 30 per cent among Carolina mills tended to offset strength of the stock market and advices from dry goods quarters that retail sales were running ahead of a year ago this month.

In contrast with active retail distribution, reports from wholesale and jobbing circles continued to show limited forward buying. A desire to keep down stocks until after the inventory period has passed has restricted large-scale business and increased the movement toward a reduction in mill output. According to information from both Nothern and Southern mills, manufacturing costs will be higher this season, owing to the extensive waste in conversion of raw material produced in the South this year, a larger percentage of the crop than usual being below contract requirement.

The Washington report tomorrow will compare with one of 15,009,000 bales issued last month and with one of 14,373,000 bales a year ago, when the crop turned out to be 14,450,000 bales. Census figures of ginning will compare with 11,894,000 bales in the last report and 12,560,000 to Dec. 1 last year. Gins turned out 1,239,000 bales during the last period of 1928 and private estimates this year range between 900,000 and 1,000,000 bales.

This week's statistics show that the South has moved into sight about 400,000 bales more than last year, and as a result port and interior stocks now aggregate 4,000,000 bales, or 450,000 more than last year. With exports about 400,000 behind last season, the amount in store and afloat for Europe is 350,000 bales less than last year and nearly 500,000 less than two years ago.

5 DISTRIBUTERS WANTED.
New York City, Eastern Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, Connecticut.
Huntley Manufacturing Company, Brocton, N. Y., established 1853, over 96 years ago, will consider applications from men to take over distribution of their line in the metropolitan district of New York City, also the Connecticut, Eastern Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Maryland territories. We have a remarkable product, a strong international personnel and tremendous financial resources, and we are accepted by the wholesaler and chain system whom you will sell in carload lots as the oldest and most powerful corporation in the East, having the world's largest and most magnificent plant manufacturing our particular line.
Any bank in the East will immediately confirm that our R. G. Dun rating is A-1 ($750,000). This authentic information is very important to you because you have turned to the business opportunity page of this newspaper for investment, and this is just such an opportunity and is only open to applicants who have anticipated exactly this type of an opening in the future and have had sufficient good judgment and vision in handling their affairs in the past, that they are now able to invest $1,000 cash immediately to finance part of their initial distribution supply. The general rule of computing a fair return to investors in manufacturing is applied in this instance, for this is an investment plus your personal services and should show a splendid profit weekly which should appeal to the progressive organization has found difficulty in selecting a profitable and dependable business that can be operated with such moderate capital, reasonable prospects of realizing profits within a comparatively short time.
Here is an attractive, permanent connection that requires no training and is open to five men only, over 35 years of age, preferably those who have had some experience conducting a business of their own or directing others, and to such men experience in our particular line would not be required. Write fully about yourself to the address below and state which of the five territories listed above you are interested in and if you are able to interest us sufficiently in your first letter, our Mr. J. S. Frances will grant you an interview in New York City only in about ten days. Address Huntley Mfg. Co. (executive offices), Brocton, N. Y.

REVIEW OF WEEK IN REALTY MARKET

Abandonment of Opera House Project in Rockefeller Centre Leads to New Plans.

ACTIVITY IN GREENWICH AREA

Two Large Warehouses Taken on Long Leaseholds—East Side Properties Sold.

Announcement that the projected plan to erect a magnificent opera house on the Columbia University property controlled under long leases by John D. Rockefeller Jr., within the Forty-eighth to Fifty-first Street blocks west of Fifth Avenue, and the statement yesterday from John R. Todd of Todd, Robertson & Todd of plans for artistic commercial development of the property provided the chief elements of interest in the realty market during the week. The official statement of the opera house abandonment stressed the fact that several leases running to 1931 could not be acquired on satisfactory terms. This condition, it was said, constituted an "insuperable obstacle" to carrying out the plan, but there was a general feeling in realty circles that other difficulties contributed largely to the decision.

Mr. Todd's brief statement, however, assures the fact that the valuable property will be improved in an attractive and useful manner for high-class business activities, the highest buildings contemplated for the area being from twenty to fifty stories. Prospective tenants are being consulted regarding their particular needs. Several tentative plans are under consideration, according to Mr. Todd, and the announcement of definite action will be awaited with keen interest in the Manhattan realty world.

Market Fairly Quiet.

Market conditions were fairly quiet. The downtown district furnished several small transactions and a moderate amount of activity was apparent in the east side Yorkville area, operators figuring in most of the trading. Interesting midtown deals were the sale of the property at the northeast corner of Madison Avenue and Forty-eighth Street, being its first ownership change in sixty years, and the purchase by operators of the fine residence at 10 East Fifty-second Street, originally built for August Heckscher, which is expected to be altered for business.

Sales in Manhattan reported but not recorded aggregated 144, as compared with 138 in the preceding week. South of Fifty-ninth Street the sales were 77, as against 72 the previous week, and north of Fifty-ninth Street there were 67 sales, compared with 66 the week before.

In the Bronx 65 sales were reported, as against 62 during the preceding week and 79 for the corresponding period one year ago, according to The Record and Guide.

A large leasehold transaction was closed yesterday in the westerly Greenwich Village section in the rental for ten years by Coy-Bristow & Co. from Thomas J. Farrell and others of the old five-story warehouse at 686-690 Greenwich Street, plot 75 by 88 and irregular, adjoining the northwest corner of Christopher Street. The lease dates from Feb. 1, 1930, at $6,500 a year in addition to taxes, and the tenant has an option to renew for an additional ten years at a net yearly rental of 6 per cent on the value of the property but not to be less than $6,500. The brokers were L. Tanenbaum, Strauss & Co.

Another Lease in Same Vicinity.

Another long lease in the same locality was closed through Ames & Co. in the rental to the L. Ellinger Company for Brooks & Porter of the seven-story warehouse at 507 Hudson Street, 28 by 100, between Christopher and Tenth Streets. The gross rental for the leasehold term will aggregate $200,000. The building will be altered by the Ellinger Company for its downtown branch, which at present is at 24 Washington Street.

In the east side Yorkville area the two five-story tenements at 508 and 510 East Eighty-eighth Street, plot 50 by 100 feet, were purchased by the Delmarose Realty Corporation from the York Realty Company. The deal was erroneously printed as Eighty-first Street on Friday.

The three-story building at 304 East Fiftieth Street, 18.6 by 80 feet, has been sold for Ida Sandberg through Louis Lent & Son, brokers.

Rebecca Pomrinse bought from the 107 West Twenty-fourth Street Realty Corporation a four-story building at that address, which is the "key" to the northwest corner of Sixth Avenue.

FRATERNITIES PLAN NEW CLUB HOME HERE

Midtown Site Sought for Building of at Least Sixteen Stories.

A site in the midtown section of Manhattan is being sought by the New York Fraternity Clubs for the erection of a new building to house the societies, it was learned as the result of a questionnaire recently sent out to the fraternity membership in New York. Twenty-one individual clubs have been associated as the New York Fraternity Clubs, with quarters at 22 East Thirty-eighth Street.

Their lease on space in this building expires in less than two years, and it is now proposed that the clubs erect a home of their own. Although no announcement of a definite site has been made, it is understood the clubs are seeking a suitable location in the midtown area above Thirty-fourth Street and east of Fifth Avenue. It is proposed to preserve the identies of the individual clubs, which, for social purposes, will continue as separate units. Their business affairs, however, would be uniformly operated from a central office.

The building as suggested in tentative plans would be at least sixteen stories high, with athletic and dining facilities. The cost of land and building is estimated at $1,800,000, and the cost of furnishings $243,000.

SALES IN NEW JERSEY.

Tract of 21 Acres at Tenafly Is Purchased for Development.

Sale of 21.5 acres of land with 750 feet frontage on the north side of Clinton Avenue, Tenafly, N. J., for the Tenafly Development Corporation was announced by Borg, Rusch & Boyd, Inc., of Hackensack, the brokers in the deal. The purchaser was the Parker-Hazlitt Coporation, which acquired the property for investment.

The land is situated about 2,750 feet west of the Sylvan Boulevard, State road leading from the new Fort Lee Bridge going north. Clinton Avenue has been taken over by the county, and improvements including gas, water and concrete paving are under way.

The four-family brick flat at 902 Bloomfield Street, Hoboken, has been sold by Annie and Charles J. La Birch of Brooklyn to William C. Sankowsky of Hoboken. The house is on a site 20 by 82 feet, and was reported held at $18,000. J. I. Kislak, Inc., acted as brokers.

Rents Former Home of O. G. Villard.

The American basement dwelling at 181 East Seventy-first Street, 16.10 by 100 feet, between Lexington and Third Avenues, formerly owned by Oswald Garrison Villard, has been leased by a member of the New York Curb Exchange. The house was obtained from its present owner, Dr. Joseph J. Ringwald, who purchased it a few years ago from Mr. Villard. Warren L. Marks acted as broker for the owner, the lessee being represented by Sutton, Blagden & Lynch. The lease carries an option to purchase within six months.

MORTGAGES RECORDED.

The Greenwich Savings Bank took a mortgage for $50,000 from Harry H. Kutner on the southeast corner of Lenox Avenue and 125th Street, 110.11 by 85 feet, this being consolidated with other mortgages held by the bank to make one first lien of $325,000, due according to the bond.

The City Federation Hotel, May A. Sedgwick, president, gave a mortgage to the Title Guarantee and Trust Company for $80,000, due in five years at 6 per cent, on the two four-story buildings at 443-45 West Twenty-second Street, between Ninth and Tenth Avenues.

On the premises at 125 Maiden Lane and 9 Fletcher Street George F. Moody gave a purchase-money mortgage for $32,500 to the trustees under the will of Eliza Gardner Board. The principal is due Dec. 5, 1934, at 5½ per cent. Mr. Moody has reconveyed this property to J. Clarence Davies, Inc.

On the dwelling at 28 Park Avenue, adjoining the northwest corner of Thirty-fifth Street, 30 by 100 feet, William D. Guthrie gave a mortgage to the Seamen's Savings Bank for $100,000, due three years hence, at 6 per cent.

Ernest E. Lorillard, who resides at Yemassee, S. C., gave a $125,000 three-year mortgage at 6 per cent to the New York Title and Mortgage Company on the ten-story building at 296 Broadway, which is on a plot fronting 23 feet on Broadway, just above Reade Street, and in the rear on Manhattan Place for 23 feet.

The south corner of Fifth Avenue and Seventy-third Street, occupied by a thirteen-story structure on a plot 77 by 130 feet, has been mortgaged to the 920 Holding Corporation, James E. R. Carpenter, president, to the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company for $150,000. This has been consolidated with another mortgage owned by the insurance company into a single first lien of $875,000, due Sept. 1, 1936, at 6 per cent until Dec. 1, 1931, and 5½ per cent thereafter.

The Society of Professional Automobile Engineers, Stephen J. O'Brien, president, gave an additional mortgage for $13,500 to the Empire City Savings Bank on 153-59 West Sixty-fourth Street, this being combined with another mortgage to make a first lien of $150,000, due Dec. 2, 1934, at 6 per cent, and amortized $1,500 semi-annually.

BUSINESS LEASES.

Leases of space for business purposes were announced yesterday as follows:

Transactions at Bayside and Jackson Heights.

Plans for the erection of a six-story elevator apartment house on the west side of Christy Street, 100 feet north of Ahles Avenue, Bayside, on a plot 140 by 100 feet, were announced yesterday by Kessler-Hess, Inc., Jamaica builders, through the firm of McKnight-Dayton in Bayside. The building will occupy 125 feet frontage and will have a depth of seventy-five feet, allowing space for courts.

D. Lacy Dayton of the McKnight-Dayton Company predicted that this initial apartment project would be the forerunner of a number of similar improvements in the community due to the recent completion of an adequate sewer system there.

Sale of a Colonial garden home on Twenty-ninth Street, Jackson Heights, to Joseph A. Quinlan, general traffic manager of the St. Regis Paper Company, was announced by the Queensboro Corporation.

CHURCHES MORTGAGE MANHATTAN REALTY

Two Congregations Get Permission of Supreme Court to Finance Improvements.

The Reformed Low Dutch Church of Harlem has obtained permission from Supreme Court Justice Wasservogel to mortgage its property at the southwest corner of Third Avenue and 123d Street, known as 2,257-2,261 Third Avenue, and 200-204 East 123d Street, known as 2,257-2,261 Third Avenue, and 200-204 East 123d Street, to the Title Guarantee and Trust Company for $150,000, and property at 182 East 122d Street to the Bank for Savings for $15,000.

The petition of the church by the pastor, the Rev. Dr. Edgar Tilton, and the treasurer, Alphonse D. Rockwell, states that the church has made a lease for thirty years of the property at the Third Avenue and 123d Street corner and under an agreement with the lessee is to spend $160,000 in removing several old buildings at that corner and erecting a modern five-story building.

The church will use part of the proceeds of the mortgages for this work and devote some of it to releasing an existing mortgage for $85,000 on the property. The remainder will be applied to altering and improving the property recently purchased at 59-67 East Eighty-ninth Street from the Church of the Beloved Disciple, at a cost of $425,000, on which the church plans to spend $360,000 more.

The church owns other real estate than the parcels mortgaged, amounting to $1,300,000, chiefly in Harlem, including three churches and two parsonages. It has personal assets of $270,000 and owes $772,000 on mortgages on seventeen parcels of property, which include $80,000 on the church at the northwest corner of Lenox Avenue and 123d Street, $42,000 on 2,256-2,260 Third Avenue, $200,000 on the new church property in East Eighty-ninth Street and a total of $140,000 on 2,259-2,261 and 2,226-34 Third Avenue.

The Holy Trinity Church also got permission from Justice Wasservogel to mortgage its property at the southwest corner of Seaman Avenue and Cummings Street for $85,000 to the West Side Savings Bank for the purpose of finishing a parish house there. The building is to cost $122,000, and $52,000 has already been paid oon it. The church owns no other real estate but has personal property worth $153,700, against which they are debts of $8,000.

PARSON TRIPS PREMIER

Country Watcher Causes Stir in Parliament by Pointing to Lapsus by MacDonald.

HECTIC WEEK IN POLITICS

Lord Chief Justice Stands on His Dignity—Woman Labor Minister Scores in Debate.

By ERNEST MARSHALL.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 5.—Ramsay MacDonald eating humble pie, Stanley Baldwin riding his high horse, Lloyd George volubly explaining that he could not possibly be wrong whoever else might have made a mistake, Lord Hewart standing on his double dignity both as Lord Chief Justice and as a peer of the realm; Lord Carson giving a characteristic exhibition of unnecessary violence, Miss Margaret Bondfield placidly explaining that she could not dip her fingers more deeply into the public purse, Mr. Maxton and his band of Clydesiders clamoring for excommunication from the Labor party and Herbert Morrison, Minister of Transport, calmly flinging a bombshell into the midst of London traffic—such were the chief figures which this week made their entrances, and in some cases their exits, from the forefront of the Parliamentary scene.

The Prime Minister ate his humble pie with a grace and good humor that suggested his confidence that although, like Little Jack Horner, he had this time been put in a corner, he would on another occasion put in his thumb and pull out a plum which everybody would envy him eating.

Mr. MacDonald had, in the stress of Cabinet making, by an innocent inadvertence, appointed seven Under-Secretaries of State with a seat in the House of Commons, whereas he is limited by constitutional practice and law to half a dozen nominations of the kind. Lord Palmerston had made a similar error more than sixty years ago and both Disraeli and Gladstone had regarded it as a serious encroachment upon the rights of Englishmen. Under the law each and every one of the seven Under-Secretaries was liable to a fine of £500 a day for every day they had sat officially in Parliament. Commander Carlyon Bellairs invoked the authority of the Lord Chief Justice, who was waging a campaign against the tyranny of the new bureaucracy, in justification of his plea that a bill of indemnity for which the Prime Minister was asking on behalf of one and all of his unfortunate Under-Secretaries should be examined by a select committee of the House of Commons before it was passed. Neither Stanley Baldwin nor Lloyd George, however, viewed the Prime Minister's innocent inadvertence in quite so tragic a light and Commander Bellairs withdrew his motion.

Error Discovered by "Outsider.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the incident is that it was not a politician nor even a member of Parliament who first discovered Mr. MacDonald's breach of the constitutional law, but a country clergyman who, as the Premier said, was one of those people who apparently spent their lives in acquiring interesting out-of-the-way knowledge. Algernon Ashton, who had beaten all records in Great Britain by publicly calling attention to the mistakes to which all human beings are prone, has been outdone by the anonymous parson.

There was more serious ground for an objection raised by Stanley Baldwin to the appointment of Lord Chief Justice Hewart as the representative of a political party on a committee set up to study the question of electoral reform. It was Lloyd George who submitted Lord Hewart's name to Lord Ullswater, formerly Speaker of the House of Commons.

Mr. Baldwin's protest against the nomination of Lord Hewart was based on the principle that no member of a judicial bench should be employed on any committee or commission on the strength of his partisan opinions. Lloyd George addressed several reasons of more or less cogency in explanation and extenuation of his selection of Lord Hewart, and he taunted Mr. Baldwin with having said nothing about the matter when Lord Hewart's name was first submitted to Lord Ullswater. Finally, he produced a letter from Lord Hewart withdrawing his acceptance of the appointment to the committee, and there the matter ended so far as open Parliamentary debate was concerned.

By no means the last of it has been heard in other ways. Lord Hewart followed up his formal resignation by a letter to The London Times in which he raises the question of whether his judicial office precludes him from holding or expressing an opinion on such a topic as electoral law reform. He pointed out that in addition to being Lord Chief Justice of England he was also a peer of the United Kingdom, and in that capacity was summoned by the writ issued from the Crown Office to give counsel upon affairs of State. This was not a privilege to be enjoyed, but a responsibility to be discharged.

Lord Hewart had in the past taken up a position regarding the duties and obligations of his office as Lord Chief Justice which found him in conflict with many constitutional lawyers of as high standing as himself and it is only to be expected that the whole question will be the subject of a somewhat arid but highly important controversy in the legal arena.

Lord Hewart has many supporters, particularly among those whose line of argument is that the judicial bench is the keystone of English liberty and that as "the complexities of modern life tend more and more to make dictators of governments and of Parliaments mere recording machines for governmental decrees there is all the more reason for safe-

Little Thing Like a Meteor Fails to Discourage Bride

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BELGRADE, Nov. 20.—The heavens "blessed" a bride in unwonted and unwelcome form in the village of Zvezvan today. As the wedding party was nearing the church a meteor fell into one of the carriages immediately in front of that in which the bride was seated.

One of the wedding guests, a man, was killed, the woman sitting opposite him was badly injured and the bride fainted. The crowd scattered in panic, but after a brief delay the marriage was duly solemnized.

The meteor, which was glowing hot, measured forty centimeters in diameter.

ITALY IS APATHETIC TO LONDON PARLEY

Public Hopes for Parity With France, but Cares Little What Other Powers Do.

FINANCES BAR BIG NAVY

Even the Desire for Equality With French Is Based on Holding National Prestige.

By ARNALDO CORTESI.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ROME, Dec. 5.—Despite the fact that the date set for the London naval conference is rapidly approaching, the Italian public as a whole is showing remarkably little interest in it. Newspapers almost daily print long articles on the subject, as well as detailed summaries of editorials from foreign papers, but they are seldom read by the ordinary man in the street who, beyond ardently desiring that the powers recognize Italy's naval equality with France, cares mighty little whether the other powers decide to limit naval armaments or continue competitive building.

The reasons for Italian apathy are not far to seek. Financial conditions do not permit Italy to have a large navy, whether international agreements allow her to build one or not. In the same way as Italy has never been able to build the full number of ships permitted her at Washington, so it is highly unlikely that she ever will be able to build the full number of other types of ships, the limitation of which will be discussed in London. The limitation of naval armaments, in other words, will not result in any benefit to the pocketbooks of Italian taxpayers, nor will it materially alter the present ratio of Italian naval strength compared with other nations.

The question of naval parity with France, however, is another matter altogether. Italians look upon it purely as a matter of national prestige. Even though Italians are convinced that their financial status forbids them ever having the same tonnage in ships as France, yet they would feel badly hurt if Italian inferiority with respect to France were officially consecrated by an international treaty.

Feeling Strong on Parity.

Italian feeling on this point, which is very strong, should not be lost sight of at the London conference. Italy is probably ready to give way in almost all other matters under discussion, but not on this one point. Quite apart from popular sentiment, it is a safe prediction that the Italian Government will never accept anything but equality with France.

It is evident, in fact, that Premier Mussolini cannot afford to let it be said that the Fascist Government obtained less in London than was obtained in Washington by a delegation headed by Senator Schanzer, Foreign Minister under the Liberal-Democratic régime, and a member of which was Senator Albertini, one of the leaders of the present anti-Fascist opposition in the Senate. Against this rock all French arguments will surely founder.

Italy will probably be accommodating on all other points. In recent days, for instance, Italy was converted to the Anglo-American theory concerning the suppression of submarines. At first Italy decidedly rejected any such proposal. Recently, however, though her conversion is not yet complete, she appears to look on such a scheme with far less disfavor. The reason for the change is probably the fact that it has been realized that submarines are weapons which cut both ways.

In other words, it has been realized that submarines may represent a severe handicap for Italy in the improbable event of war with some greatly superior naval power like England or France. On the other hand, the fact that her enemy would also not be allowed to have any submarines would take a great weight off Italy's mind in the more likely event of war with some inferior naval power, such as Yugoslavia.

Mussolini's Policy Stands.

The Italian policy on disarmament remains that which was long ago announced by Premier Mussolini, namely, that Italy is ready to agree to any measure of disarmament, provided Italian armaments are not inferior to those of any other European power. This, of course, refers to armaments as a whole, including naval, land and air.

Translated into terms of naval disarmament alone, the Italian policy probably can be stated thus, that Italy is ready to agree to any degree of naval disarmament, however sweeping, provided Italian parity with France be recognized. If this

GENEVA WEIGHS IDEA OF 'GENERAL STAFF'

Would Have Secretariat Chiefs Meet From Time to Time to Study Questions of Policy.

NON-MEMBERS ONE PHASE

Group Could Determine What the League's Attitude Toward Them at Conferences Should Be.

By CLARENCE K. STREIT.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

GENEVA, Dec. 5.—The idea of providing the League of Nations with a sort of "general staffs" so as better to coordinate its work for peace and keep it one leap ahead of events, is being studied in inner circles here. The suggestion is that some of the leading officials of the Secretariat, especially the old hands who have been in it since the beginning, get together from time to time outside the wood of day-to-day details and try to see the forest instead of the trees.

For some time it has been felt that League activities have been getting so intense and so widespread that it is impossible for any one, even in the Secretariat, to know precisely all that is going on. Moreover, all are now so occupied with special activities that none has enough time to consider what to do about the general problems constantly confronting every section of the League and which they are tackling now in piecemeal hit or miss fashion.

One such question suggested for the "general staff" is the policy the League ought to follow toward non-member States. Special attention has been called to it by reports that Mexico is considering entering the League. That in turn is a reminder that another non-member which has refused to join the League because it did not desire to interfere in the political affairs of other nations is responsible for Mexico's absence.

Why Mexico Stayed Out.

Mexico stayed out because she never recovered from the blow to her pride when she was not included among the States originally invited to join. She was not included because Woodrow Wilson, apparently from anger with Adolfo de la Huerta, then Provisional President, refused to invite his Southern neighbor into his universal league. Lord Cecil also opposed inviting Mexico because Britain then did not recognize her, but he was willing to leave the decision to President Wilson, who overrode Secretary of State Lansing's advice and refused.

Even so, it is recalled, the Senate was preoccupied by the possibility of Mexico using her right to ask admittance to the League anyway.

During its debate on the League covenant the Senate spent two days gravely discussing this fine point: If the Rio Grande went on and by changing its river bed transferred a few hundred acres of Mexican soil to the American side of the frontier, could this be considered aggression involving League intervention under Article X to protect Mexico's territorial integrity?

Should Mexico now join the League, the non-members will be reduced to the United States, Russia, Turkey, Afghanistan, the Hedjaz, Ecuador, Brazil and Costa Rica, the latter two being the only seceders from Geneva.

What Attitude Should Be.

What should be Geneva's attitude toward this group of strange oedfellows? When it invites them to a conference should it stipulate certain conditions, for instance, that the usual League procedure be followed, that the resulting convention be deposited with the secretariat, &c? Or should the fifty-four League members continue to let the few non-League guests at the conference interfere with the work by petty objections to their hosts' way of doing things simply because they are squeamish about anything bearing the label "League"?

Should an accounting system be worked out whereby non-League members attending a League conference would have to contribute their just share to the expenses? Or should it continue to be left to their own self-respect whether they pay anything or nothing or—as does the United States—on a basis selected by itself, which by excluding overhead and other items makes its contributions considerably smaller than they would be if it were a member of the League?

What should be done about a system which in general gives all the advantages of the League to a few States which refuse to accept its obligations? It is argued that a "general staff" might profitably study all the phases of that question.

Another Task.

Another suggested task would be for the staff to analyze League experience of the past ten years with a view to determining what are really Geneva's strong points and weak points and what tactics have proved most or least successful.

For instance, is the growing practice of holding League conferences outside Geneva really wise? Strong opposition is already developing against this practice, largely as a result of the difficulties the conference just ended at Paris on the treatment of foreigners encountered. These difficulties are blamed on the absence of the famous "Geneva atmosphere"—which in most cases really means the powerful influence the secretariat subtly exerts on all meetings held here.

Moreover, it has been found that League conferences held outside Geneva get far less world publicity than those held here, where there is a corps of correspondents from nearly all countries who have become specialists on such questions.

Geology of the Antarctic Continent; An Area Greater Than That of Europe

Structure Apparently Resembles That of Africa—Knowledge of Interior Lacking at Present—Geology Indicates Milder Climate in Early Ages.

By GRIFFITH TAYLOR,

Professor of Geography, University of Chicago, Senior Geologist and Leader of Western Parties in the British Antarctic Expedition of 1910-1913.

The Antarctic Continent.

Antarctica is a huge continent, probably containing 4,500,000 square miles. It is thus considerably larger than Europe and 50 per cent greater than the United States. In structure it seems to resemble Africa more than any other continent, for it consists apparently of a gigantic plateau, probably with an average elevation of some 6,000 feet, rising to 11,000 feet near the South Pole. The most striking structural feature is the enormous fault-scarp which extends from Cape Adare down the west side of the Ross Sea to the Queen Maud Range and beyond, near the Pole. This scarp is probably paralleled by another some 60 or 100 miles to the west, which is, however, hidden by the margin of the great ice plateau. Between these two fault-scarps lies the great Antarctic Horst. This is an elongated slice of the earth's crust, which has been thrust upward so that some of its mountains rise to 15,000 feet. The horst is shown in diagram in the map and also in Section B.

The above remarks refer mainly to the larger portion of Antarctica which contains the South Pole and which, lying in east longitude, is called East Antarctica. But about one-third of the continent lies in west longitude, and in this area is situated Byrd's base at Little America. Between Byrd's base and Mount Erebus, where most of the British expeditions have wintered, extends the unique ice shelf once known as the Ross Barrier. This floats as a thin mobile sheet some 400 miles wide and only a few hundred feet thick on the vast southern extension of the Ross Sea. We know much more of the eastern side of the ice shelf as the result of Byrd's activities. On the American side of West Antarctica lies the archipelago of Graham Land, which before Wilkins's flight in December, 1928, was thought to be a peninsula extending north from the mainland. We have no knowledge of the interior of the continent save at the South Pole, nor of more than half the coast line. On the American side there is a colossal submarine ridge, appearing at places in the form of islands, which seems to connect the Graham Archipelago with the Andes of South America.

Section A.

Geological Formation Interesting.

The geological formations in the Antarctic are based almost entirely on collections from the Ross Sea region and from Graham Land. We may hope for new deposits when Gould's collections in the Rockefeller Range and Queen Maud Range are worked out. But it is curious that the Ross Sea rocks give us a fairly complete series of the older portions of the geological record—while the Graham Land specimens are concerned mainly with the later chapters in the record. Rough cross-sections from these two localities are shown in the drawings reproduced in this article.

Commencing with the Section B across the horst in East Antarctica, the basal portion of the continent consists of granites and rocks allied to gneiss and schists. This series is probably more or less universal in Antarctica and no doubt forms the lower portion of the Queen Maud Range, where Byrd crossed the horst on his flight to the Pole. The oldest sedimentary rocks are Cambrian limestones, which have been collected on the Beardmore Glacier somewhat north of the Queen Maud Range. They contain interesting corals (Archeo cyathinae), which seem to have flourished almost throughout the world in Cambrian seas. Similar rocks have been dredged in the Weddell Sea on the American side. Far north, at Cape Adare, Priestly describes folded slaty rocks which may be of this date, but no fossils occur therein.

Remarkable Sandstone Formation.

One of the most remarkable formations in the world builds up a large part of the Antarctic Horst. This is the Beacon sandstone series, consisting chiefly of level-bedded sandstones, but including some shales and coal seams. It has a depth of many thousand feet and includes beds from Devonian up to Rhaetic in age. It clearly indicates that Antarctica was a region of steady sedimentation all through later Paleozoic and early Mesozoic times. Numerous plates of fossil fish were found at Granite Harbor in the southwest of Ross Sea which date the lower beds as Devonian. Here also my party discovered coal seams, though we could not actually reach the outcrop. However, Wild and Wilson recorded several seams of coal at the head of the Beardmore Glacier. It is likely that these rocks with their well-preserved fern leaves of Permian age will occur in the Queen Maud Range, whose cross-section is likely to resemble that shown in Section B. The upper beds of the Beacon sandstone may be of Rhaetic age, judging from fossil trees found by Priestly in the horst south of Cape Adare. Throughout these sandstones are vast horizontal sills of quartz dolerite which are perhaps of Cretaceous age, while Mount Erebus is an active volcano built up of kenyte, a lava similar to that of Mount Kenya in Africa.

Section B.

Turning now to West Antarctica, somewhat similar eruptive rocks occur in the base of the mountains, though they resemble the rocks of the Andes more than those of the Ross Sea area. The more interesting beds, however, are much younger and are folded from west to east. At Hope Bay a rich Jurassic flora was discovered containing many ferns. At Snow Hill many Cretaceous coals were collected, while near by from Seymour Island early Tertiary trees with early penguins have been described. A series of Pliocene shells was found near by at Cockburn Island. It is a most remarkable fact that almost all the evidence in Antarctica points to milder or even warm conditions obtaining throughout the geological record. Only in one place in Graham Land has a fossil "till" been found—possibly of early Tertiary age—which shows that Antarctica was glaciated before late Tertiary times.

Is Antarctic Continent Linked With South America and Australia?

Professor Henry Fairfield Osborn, President of the American Museum of Natural History, comments upon Byrd's South Polar expedition:

"* * * My particular interest is in the geological findings of the expedition, the fossil remains that may be found in this great area that will date for us the Antarctic Continent. One of the most important problems is its relation to South America on the one hand and Australia on the other. I am a strong believer in the theory that the Antarctic Continent will be found to be linked with both, and this expedition more than any other undertaking should throw light upon that theory."

Byrd's own stories appear exclusively in New York in The Times. Russell Owen of The Times staff is the only correspondent with the expedition. The news comes by radio direct from the Antarctic to The Times station. All of the adventure of the Antarctic exploration, all of the interesting scientific discoveries are reported in The New York Times. Do not miss a chapter. Order The Times delivered regularly. Do not take a chance—The Times is sold out early.

YOUNG LA FOLLETTE MAY BE CANDIDATE

Baffled by Kohler, Wisconsin Progressives Consider Phil for Governorship.

MOVE WOULD BE DARING

Fight Would Be Against "Monopoly of Wealth"—Governor Is Not Perturbed.

By FRED C. SHEASBY.

Editorial Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MILWAUKEE, Dec. 5.—Governor Walter J. Kohler, independent conservative, has so baffled the La Follettes in Wisconsin politics that they are seriously considering running at 32-year-old candidate against him next year. They have in mind Phil La Follette, whose brother, "young Bob," was elected to the United States Senate to succeed their father.

Then sentiment and sympathy extended beyond the usually bitter ranks of factionalism and there was no test of a family name which for more than a quarter of a century has represented great political power in Wisconsin and which has made something of an impression nationally. But with one La Follette in the Senate at Washington and another La Follette seeking the Governorship in Madison, the family name would be put to its greatest test.

A Daring Move.

The Progressives have never tried anything quite so daring. Wisconsin, though, is unorthodox politically and things which might be considered impossible in other States are not impossible here. And the record is that although the elder La Follette often failed to put over State candidates of his choosing, the name of La Follette itself has scored victory after victory. In this instance, however, there is the tradition that it is only under extraordinary circumstances that Wisconsin refuses to give its Governor a second term and there is nothing which suggests that Governor Kohler has lost ground since last year.

The fact that Phil La Follette looms as the Progressives' choice against him is a confession that they do not believe they could defeat him with any other candidate. In 1926 the La Follettes had a really capable candidate for Governor in former Attorney General Herman L. Ekern, but he lacked the personality to catch on. Last year they tried a rough-and-ready politician in former Representative Joseph D. Beck, but Mr. Kohler, a newcomer, defeated him. Now the Progressives are slightly panicky over the prospect of another term for Kohler, which would make him a formidable candidate against Senator John J. Blaine in 1932.

Followed Father's Course.

Phil La Follette followed the course of his father by becoming District Attorney of Dane County after graduating from the University of Wisconsin. He could have been re-elected to that office hands down, but took up the private practice of law instead. He is a member of the Law Faculty at the State University, married and his son was named Robert M. La Follette Jr. Phil is a fine-featured, slender young fellow, more boyish than his brother, exceptionally gifted in oratory, dramatic and fiery like his father, democratic, pleasant and companionable.

Even those on the other side politically admit that he is likely timber, and the possibility that he would rally the old La Follette forces is not being passed off lightly. But there would be the cry of an oligarchy in Wisconsin politics and Phil would have to meet it.

Some Progressives liken the stage setting to that when old Bob opened his fight against the railroads and millionaires dominating Wisconsin politics. The settings are not identical, although not altogether dissimilar. The elder La Follette was new and the only La Follette in politics at that time. He dramatized representative government against privilege for the few in a strong appeal to the crusading spirit of the State, but as attractive as he was he went down in defeat a couple of times before winning the Governorship.

Now there would be this test of a family name, and if Phil were defeated by anything like a decisive vote it might set the La Follette movement back for years. Progressives have thought about that, but appear willing to take the gamble.

They have issues to talk out with the people, the public ownership of light and power utilities and chain banking.

Briefly, they will fight what they call the "monopoly of wealth." Phil Lafollette is about the State making speeches in which he denounces the concentration of money as detrimental to local interests everywhere. He usually concludes with the statement that he will be back soon to talk over all public questions with the people.

So the impression grows that he is getting ready to run for Governor.

Kohler is Unruffled.

Meanwhile Governor Kohler pursues the calm policy of a business man in public life. His closest political friends would like to have him renew old contacts in a swing around the State but he sticks pretty close to his desk in Madison.

Following the legislative session, officials in Madison looked for some relaxation but they find themselves being called to the executive office day after day as the Governor checks over public matters the same as he checks over his own private business. On the coldest days, when the mercury is down to zero, Mr. Kohler flies from his home in the village of Kohler to Madison. He says his cabin plane is very comfortable, and for the automobile ride or walk from the landing field in Madison to the Capitol he wears a fur overcoat.

The Lafollettes are well along with their campaign plans for 1930 but Governor Kohler has not even started. Nevertheless things in his camp are in good order and when it comes to covering ground, once he starts, the Progressives will have a time keeping up with him. He can cover more counties in one afternoon of flying than they can cover in two or three days by automobile.

OBSERVATIONS FROM TIMES WATCH-TOWERS

Transplanted Negroes Get Supply of Red 'Chewin' Cane'

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SAVANNAH, Dec. 3.—Just be-because they have "done gone and gone Nawth" doesn't mean that the South Georgia negro will have to do without his "chewin' cane" in the Fall and Winter. Unusually large shipments of cane have been made recently to the Harlem district and other parts of New York where negroes who formerly lived in the South are now residing.

The Southern negro likes his sugar cane tall and red. In this he differs from the white folks, who prefer the "white" or green cane, which is of much softer texture and more easily chewed.

Down near Albany, Ga., a few days ago a solid carload of red sugarcane was sent to a Chicago retailer, but the biggest shipments go to New York and adjacent points in New Jersey.

INDIANA HAS TIRED OF ITS CONSTITUTION

Document Is 80 Years Old and Despite Amendments Is Not Deemed Adequate.

CONVENTION MAY BE CALLED

Revision Was Delayed by Fear That Klan and Dry League Would Dominate Proceedings.

By HAROLD C. FEIGHTNER.

Editorial Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

INDIANAPOLIS, Dec. 3.—Indiana, operating under an 80-year-old Constitution which manifestly has not permitted the government to keep abreast of modern development, has set machinery in motion looking toward a revision of its basic law. The voters in the State election next Fall will decide whether to call a Constitutional convention. If the proposal is approved, as many think it will be, two or three years must elapse before the new instrument can become operative.

For more than ten years leaders in Indiana have admitted the necessity of Constitutional revision, but have refrained from promoting the idea because of a probably well-founded fear that the Ku Klux Klan and the Indiana Anti-Saloon League would, by a combination of forces, take charge of the proceedings and write in radical provisions. Now that the Klan is virtually dead as a political element and the Anti-Saloon League has been rendered impotent by the death of its militant leader, E. S. Shumaker, those favoring a new Constitution believe the time has come to press for the change.

There are other groups that must be taken into consideration, however. One of the most powerful is the Indiana Federation of Farm Bureaus, which in a recent State convention went on record as approving a Constitutional convention.

Farmers Seek Tax Changes.

The farmers will concentrate on taxation. For several years now they have been advocating changes in the law which would shift the burden of taxation from real estate to other forms of wealth, but always have encountered an obstacle in the Constitution, which states that "the General Assembly shall provide, by law, for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation." They have urged the adoption of an income tax and now have an amendment pending which would permit the imposition of a tax on incomes.

Indiana does not seem to take kindly to taxation of incomes and in 1926 voted down a similar amendment which had been pushed through two sessions of the Legislature by the organized agrarians. It is likely that when the farmers come into a Constitutional convention with a demand for an income tax that prolonged debate will ensue.

Another factor that will be heard is the Indiana State Bar Association, which for years has been attempting to get through an amendment permitting the Legislature to fix the qualifications for admission to the bar. As it is now, "every person of good moral character" is entitled to hang out a shingle as a lawyer, a condition that has given a comparatively low rating to the Indiana bar. The association also favor the non-partisan election of judges, a change, however, which could not be brought about except by Constitutional revision.

Still another active agency in behalf of a new constitution is the Indiana League of Women Voters, which showed its political dexterity last Winter by getting a permanent voters' registration bill through both houses of the General Assembly, only to have it fail before Governor Harry G. Leslie's veto. The women are particularly anxious for a registration law. Indiana has experimented with such laws, but because registration is only actually required in the larger cities and not in the rural counties intense opposition has been encountered and there is no way under the Constitution to provide for special registrations.

Organized Labor Interested.

Organized labor, too, which showed its teeth in the recent municipal elections, would have a voice in a Constitutional convention and in all probability would seek to curb the issuance of injunctions as applied to labor disputes.

Another predominant factor that would have to be taken into account,

BAY STATE IS PUZZLED

Gillett's Withdrawal Renews Speculation About Ex-Gov. Fuller's Intentions.

HE TALKS OF "CANDIDACY"

But Leaders Do Not Know Whether He Means for the Senate or the State House.

By F. LAURISTON BULLARD.

Editorial Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Dec. 3.—Senator Frederick H. Gillett's announcement that he will not run next year for another term is the most important bit of Massachusetts political news in many months. His retirement was not unexpected, yet his formal withdrawal was a surprise—not expected because otherwise he would have to enter what is bound to be a strenuous campaign next year at the advanced age of 79 years; a surprise because he has kept his own counsel and allowed even his intimate friends to guess the answer to a question which every politician in the State wanted to have answered and because even Senator Moses of New Hampshire, chairman of the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee, could not induce Mr. Gillett early in the present year to make any positive disclosure of his intentions.

The letter of withdrawal is all that it ought to be, dignified and graceful, saying the correct things in the perfectly proper way. All the friends of the Senator give his words their full value of nominal meaning; some of his political foes declare he wanted to run all along, but that he sacrificed his personal preferences now that he has become convinced that former Governor Alvan T. Fuller intends to be a candidate for the Republican nomination.

Fuller Puzzles the State.

The burden of proof rests decidedly upon those who thus interpret Mr. Gillett's motives. But there is far more than enough to warrant the opinion that Mr. Fuller will run for the Senate. The former Governor provides the enigma which all politicians and most voters now are trying to solve. He is suave and ingratiating and cynical and brutal by turns; astute, more popular than the old-line leaders of the party are willing to concede him to be, avoiding the label of radicalism the while he capitalizes the happenings in Wall Street and State Street in his own way, offending a great body of Republicans and scrupulously refraining from offending a single Democrat—the most perplexing and intriguing figure in the Commonwealth today.

There are any number of candidates for the seat which Mr. Gillett now occupies. Every one of them wants, above all, to know the course that Fuller will pursue. The crisp little statement which the former Governor made when the papers demanded that he say something about the announcement of the Senator from Springfield was mystifying enough: "I have been expecting his decision to retire for some time. As to my own position, I am not prepared positively to announce my candidacy just yet." What candidacy? At first glance a candidacy for the Senate, of course. Yet there are some students of the Fuller methods who insist that he really intends "in due time" to try for another term as Governor. The one certainty just now is that the former Governor adheres to his old-time policy of keeping in the limelight by an occasional outburst that is bound to make the front page, as was the case with his speech before a body of Boston College football rooters the other night, and by "keeping them guessing" until the hour arrives which he accepts as propitious for the unriddling of his own riddles.

Draper Announces Himself.

Only one of the receptive candidates is as yet an avowed aspirant for the toga Mr. Gillett is wearing. This is Eben S. Draper of Hopedale, who was an aspirant for the Senate in last year's campaign, and who now says in a becomingly outright manner: "Now that Mr. Gillett has decided to retire, it is my intention to seek the honored seat which he will vacate." Mr. Draper capitalized at the same time his opportunity for a fling at Fuller, thus: "No fair-minded citizen who is loyal to Republican principles would have considered opposing Mr. Gillett if he had sought re-election in 1930."

Among the prospects are Representative Allen T. Treadway, who has the advantage of coming from the western half of the State, the half from which Mr. Gillett is derived and which often feels that the Boston end of the Commonwealth is getting more than its share of the honors and influence of office. Mr. Treadway has been long in the lower house and now is the ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee. He said today that his inclination would be to stay in the House, but that in any event it was too soon to make a decisive statement.

Mayor Malcolm Nicholls of Boston is understood to cherish aspirations for higher political office. The statement he gave out today certainly does not eliminate him from consideration for the Senate. He said: "When I was a candidate for Mayor," four years ago, "I stated that I would not be a candidate for any other office—while in the Mayor's chair." He has yet to occupy the Mayor's chair for twenty-eight days.

Former Senator William M. Butler, who entered the Senate by appointment of Governor Channing Cox after the death of Henry Cabot Lodge, and was defeated in the election which followed, is believed to cherish the hope of sometime occupying that office again. B. Loring Young, who won the nomination for the Senate last year, will not be a candidate. Butler Ames of Lowell,

PITTSBURGH PLANS TO EXTEND ITSELF

City Is Thinking Hard in Terms of Metropolitan Area Taking in Entire County.

WOULD DOUBLE POPULATION

Proponents Try to Complete the Expansion in Time for the 1930 Census.

By WILLIAM T. MARTIN.

Editorial Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 3.—If there is such a thing as a City Derby in a decennial census year, the Pittsburgh district aims to be the sensation of 1930. "District" is used advisedly; for we are thinking in terms of metropolitan area. What is contemplated is nothing less than the placing of the name City of Pittsburgh over the whole of Allegheny County, embracing 725 square miles.

The economic advantages of the scheme have been definitely shown, and, of course, in the last analysis these prevail, but at the moment the imagination has been caught by the possibility of sending Pittsburgh in one spurt from tenth to fourth place among the first ten cities of the country. New York, Chicago and Philadelphia obviously are in classes by themselves, but nearly always there are interesting changes in the placing of other municipalities in the official census list.

The 1910 census showed only eight cities with a population of more than 500,000 ranked thus: New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Boston, Cleveland, Baltimore and Pittsburgh, the latter having 533,905. Now there are at least fourteen American cities with a population exceeding 500,000.

By 1920 Detroit, not even included among the Big Eight in 1910, jumped to fourth place among the Big Ten, Cleveland became fifth, St. Louis sixth, Boston seventh, Baltimore eighth, Pittsburgh ninth and Los Angeles tenth.

Los Angeles Moves Forward.

But the next Pittsburgh heard, in unofficial estimates, was that Los Angeles, embracing an extraordinarily large area, had not only shot ahead of it in population rank but also was leaping over a number of other cities. This thing has kept up until now in the unofficial estimates Los Angeles would appear to be fourth on the list, displacing Detroit. Here are the estimates: Los Angeles, 1,500,000; Detroit, 1,378,900; Cleveland, 1,010,300; St. Louis, 848,000; Baltimore, 830,400; Boston, 779,620; Pittsburgh, 673,800.

But the population of Allegheny County, of which Pittsburgh is the heart, is entirely another matter. If the Metropolitan Pittsburgh Plan is finally adopted—and it has twice received a popular support that justifies the belief that it will be—then Los Angeles and Detroit will be confronted with the virtual doubling of the present population of Pittsburgh, sending it to 1,500,000.

Admittedly there is the important detail that metropolitan Pittsburgh, in the technical sense, is still to be formed. There is the further relevant consideration that its right even to ask to be formed in 1930 depends on a test in court.

Plan Due to Annexation Policy.

The metropolitan plan, it should be remembered, resulted from objections to the forcible annexation policy by which Pittsburgh had drawn in the former city of Allegheny and it was believed, considered applying it to several contiguous boroughs. So far are Pittsburghers from dominating the present greater city movement, however, that only five of the twenty-four memberships of the Metropolitan Commission are held by the city.

And why look far for a pattern for such a federation? Was not the County of Allegheny furnishing much the kind of medium desired for community-wide service? It built bridges and tunnels in Pittsburgh and made improvements throughout the county in addition to its many other governmental activities. Enlarge its Board of Commissioners, widen its powers in some respects, call it the city of Pittsburgh instead of the County of Allegheny, and metropolitan Pittsburgh would be realized!

Of course, it could not be quite as simple as that. The main thought, however, was to assure the minor divisions against forcible annexation. Since a constitutional enabling amendment was necessary, this guarantee of the independence of the various municipalities was imbedded in the organic law of the State. The requirement for adoption of the charter is an extraordinarily severe one. In addition to a majority vote of the county as a whole, a two-thirds majority is required in each of the municipal divisions of the county, now numbering 122.

This was almost met in the charter referendum last June. The vote of the county as a whole was more than two to one for adoption of the charter. Of the 122 municipalities, eighty-four cast a majority vote for the document, nearly fifty of them giving the necessary two to one vote. The showing convinced the commission that if the proposition were submitted at a general election, with many more voters participating, the charter would be certain of approval. It moved almost immediately for such resubmission. Then came another hitch.

The Metropolitan Commission felt certain that the provision in the Constitution enabling amendment, in the event of rejection of a charter, for resubmission of the latter in original or amended form, was all that was necessary. The Common Pleas Court held, however, that resubmission would require another act of the Legislature.

Here, indeed, was dismaying news to those working for Greater Pittsburgh in 1930. The Legislature does not meet until in 1931. The commission, still firm in its belief that no further legislation is necessary, appealed to the Supreme Court. The higher tribunal said that, inasmuch as the County Commissioners had neither resolved to resubmit the charter nor refused to do so, there really was no question to decide.

On Nov. 7 the County Commissioners resolved in a manner that presents the point in definite form, to resubmit the metropolitan charter at the general election in November, 1930, and it is hoped that the Supreme Court will clear the way for it early in the new year.

Fourteen Forest Rangers Die On Duty; Bear Kills One

WASHINGTON (AP).—Fourteen Forest Service employes lost their lives last year in pursuit of their duties.

John Thayer, junior forester in the Tongass National Forest in Alaska, was killed by a big brown bear. He was cruising over his territory, accompanied by Fred Herring, another ranger, in a government launch. While ashore they ran into the bear so suddenly that Thayer had time for only one shot. The bear rushed at him and Thayer was so badly mauled and clawed that he died that night.

Douglas Ingram, grazing inspector of the North Pacific District, was trapped by fire in Oregon and lost his life. He had previously led two fire crews to safety.

RADICALISM WANING AS ECONOMIC FORCE

But Farmer-Laborites as a Party Have Hopes of Victory in Minnesota Next Year.

EYES ON GOVERNORSHIP

Winning of That Office Would Do Much to Recoup the Party's Fallen Fortunes.

By HERBERT LEFKOVITZ.

Editorial Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ST. PAUL, Dec. 2.—Minnesota will enter the political year of 1930 facing a paradoxical situation. Radicalism as a political philosophy has practically lost all meaning, but radicalism as a political institution has high hopes of at last gathering in the prize that was denied it in its halcyon days—the Governorship—and with it the vastly enhanced powers over the State administration resulting from the reorganization act of 1925.

So far as its platform and theories go, the Farmer-Labor party of this State no longer seems to deserve its designation as radical. The economic movement out of which it arose seems to have spent its force. As an active political organization, however, the Farmer-Labor party is far from leaving the picture. It hopes at the elections next year to recoup its failing fortunes. Its ideas grow closer to those of the two old parties, but the momentum it received from the agrarian revolt of 1921 and 1922 is still carrying it on as a factor in State politics.

In a superficial way, the radical movement through which the Northwest has passed, or, rather, is passing, is analogous to Grangerism and Populism. Senator Moses was historically quite accurate when he referred to the present insurgents as "sons of wild jackasses." It was one of their close political ancestors, the Populist Senator, Richard Frank Pettigrew of South Dakota, on whom the title "wild ass of the prairie" fell some forty years ago. Both chronologically and by political inheritance these present-day independents are properly "sons."

But Senator Moses should dig with caution among the roots of this family tree. The Grangers were mostly ignorant men. Almost all of their laws have been repealed. But they left their mark on political thought and most of the proposals of the Populists, wild as they seemed at the time, have become familiar, with the two important exceptions of free silver and government ownership of railroads.

Great Leaders Lacking.

The neo-radicalism of the Northwest, however, has been a sterile school compared with the Grangers and the Populists. It has no great leaders; it has no great ideas. A habit of extravagant rhetoric it does possess, but for the practiced observer this holds no delusion or terror, for beneath is a great emptiness. It is impossible to find today in the tenets of the Farmer-Labor party any bold doctrine that fairly entitles this group to the honorable badge of radicalism.

Some tendencies toward government ownership and business baiting remain, but there is no heart in the game as it is now played by conservative laborites and chastened agrarian politicians who may have the vote of Piers Plowman but not his economic conscience. That belongs to leaders of the great and respectable farm organizations, who are at this moment falling over each other to be declared in on that half billion dollars' worth of farm relief which an entirely orthodox administration has provided.

It would be hard to find any trace, peculiarly radical, which this movement for all its political success has left on the surface. The cooperative idea was early discovered to be not radical at all but merely a choice of middlemen, and was promptly appropriated by every one—except, of course, the existing middlemen. Even McNary-Haugenism became respectable; indeed it did not originate with the radicals at all but with some conservative business men whose own accounts receivable first caused them to reflect on the ills of agriculture. The political radicals had some vague ideas, which they were quickly forced to forget, and they attached themselves to the train of McNary-Haugenism. The political significance of ten years or so of this school is merely the reverse of Disraeli's epigram, radical men and conservative measures.

It has been essentially a protest, negative itself but yet not without results. Political radicalism never did anything more serious than snap at the heels of its chief bane, the private grain trade. Economic conservatism seems to be working surely for its extinction, for, if the present marketing policies of the Federal Farm Board mean what they seem to mean, the doom of the private grain trade is written.

But, as so often is the case, the form lingers after the substance has departed. Radicalism may be dead in Minnesota, but the Farmer-Labor party still lives. The party has no program and no cry, but it has "prospects." In other words, it has a candidate. He is Floyd Olson of Minneapolis, once a Democrat, now a Farmer-Labor County Attorney. Mr. Olson is to run for Governor and there is an undercurrent of fear among Republicans not only that they can produce no one to match him as a vote getter but that he may sweep with him a host of strange names into the 1931 Legislature.

CORN BELT MOVES TO AID HOOVER PLAN

Will Speed Up Public Work, but Few States Can Increase Their Appropriations.

GOOD ROADS MAJOR ITEM

Industrial Outlook Is Good and the Farmers' Buying Power Shows More Improvement.

By ROLAND M. JONES.

Editorial Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

OMAHA, Dec. 2.—With the exception of Governor Bulow's sour note from South Dakota, the Corn Belt response to President Hoover's call for full steam ahead in public works and industrial improvement projects has been generally favorable. Industrial leaders, public officials and the press have been prompt with their commendation and offers to cooperate. Although Governor Bulow thinks the people of South Dakota are not unduly alarmed "with the present apparent disturbance of the economic equilibrium among speculators at the financial centres," other Governors told the President of the public works planned within their jurisdictions and offered him their moral support.

These replies are not confined, however, exclusively to "yessing" the President. Governor Christianson of Minnesota, for example, rather drily suggests that "more can be accomplished toward stabilization of prosperity by stimulating the farmers' buying power," and Governor Weaver of Nebraska advises that now is an excellent time to increase Federal aid appropriations for road building.

In the main, what the Middle Western States have to contribute to the President's program is good-will rather than the release of any considerable reserve of public works. Most of the construction forecast is work which would have been done in any event during the coming twelve months for which appropriations have been made and which has either been started or for which plans are nearing completion. About the most that can be done is to hurry it along.

Road Program Important.

Good roads constitute the major item of public works in this region. It has been so for some years past and will probably continue to be for several years in the future. The rapidity with which a large part of this work can be carried forward is gauged by the funds available or in sight at any given period. These come chiefly from motor vehicle registration and the gasoline tax.

Industrially the Corn Belt appears to be in excellent condition. The agricultural buying power, whether it is all that could be desired or not, is probably better than at any time since the depression following the war. The Dec. 1 report of the Tenth District Federal Reserve Bank represents the agricultural outlook as showing continued improvement, with an increasing output by industries and a rising volume of retail trade. Bank debits have been on the increase throughout the year.

The view is quite common among business men that perhaps the stock market collapse was not one of those ill winds which blow nobody good. They share the opinion of Commissioner Eastburn of the Omaha Chamber of Commerce that it may result in releasing more money for local industrial development. This seems to be borne out by the Reserve bank's report of an increase in commercial loans and a decrease in security loans.

In Omaha major construction is either under way or about to be begun which will provide for the expenditure of $14,500,000, the greater portion of it within the year. The railroads are spending $4,200,000 on new passenger terminals. In addition to new trackage, the Union Passenger Station is being entirely rebuilt, and the Burlington station opposite is being extensively remodeled. The two stations will be joined by covered elevated passageways. Another $1,000,000 is being spent by the Rock Island on a freight terminal. The Nebraska Power Company is planning for an expenditure of $4,000,000 on additions to its plant and power lines in the city and rural districts. The Joslyn Memorial, which is being erected as a home for the fine arts, will cost $3,000,000. A new county hospital will be completed next year at a cost of $750,000.

Some New Bridges.

A new bridge across the Missouri River at Plattsmouth is in course of construction, and the contract for another at Nebraska City has just been awarded. Building will be started in the Spring. If Omaha voters reject the street railway company's offer to sell its toll bridge and decide upon a new one, that will mean the beginning of work on a third bridge to cost from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000.

Several Nebraska communities have already contracted for natural gas from Southern fields, and the construction of pipe lines to supply them will represent another sizable expenditure during the coming year. A determined effort is being made to sell natural gas to Omaha. Industrial and business leaders are for it, but domestic consumers have been hostile. Their artificial gas plant, conducted as a municipal enterprise, has given such excellent service that they are loath to change. The directors of the plant believe they have the power to contract for a natural gas supply on their own initiative, but they will not do it in the face of any strong public opposition.

Besides what the Corn Belt will do itself in the way of construction, it hopes to see the result of some of the Federal Government's speeding up of public works. Leaders in the fight for a navigable channel in the Missouri River above Kansas City believe the time is ripe to urge greater activity on this stretch of the river. One of the things they are prepared to ask of the present session of Congress is an increase in the appropriation from the $12,000,000 now available to the $56,000,000 estimated as necessary to extend navigability as far north as Sioux City.

The President's Louisville address led river navigation enthusiasts to believe that he is friendly toward plans for completion of this project as rapidly as possible. What the river boosters would like is a nine-foot channel all the way from Sioux City to St. Louis, but they are not inclined to push that demand if it threatens to delay completion of the work.

Porto Rican Duelists Make Up in Ardor Some Lack of Control Over Dull Swords

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SAN JUAN, Porto Rico, Dec. 2.—According to Don Jesús Benitez Castaño, Don Alfonso Lastra Charriez said some things about him that he simply couldn't stand for, so Don Jesús said pistols and Don Alfonso said swords. Don Angel Rivero's pistols, on examination, proved to be rusty from disuse. Don Pepe Coll's sabers were dull from ditto. They were the only dueling pistols and swords in Porto Rico.

Don Jesús suggested paying the expenses of the party to go to Santo Domingo, where there would be less possibility of interruption. Don Alfonso said riding on ships made him sick, and then, too, there might be international complications. So that was out.

Don Jesús agreed to the dull swords, and Don Pepe Coll was chosen as master of ceremonies. Two wounds on either side were to win.

Don Alfonso somehow couldn't keep his left arm either behind him or above his head in finished fencing form and it got in the way of the saber of Don Jesús, who adopted the tactics of a whirling dervish juggling a machete. He had speed and his approaches were as good as his drives. He lacked something in control, however, and as a result he was debited with a foul for scratching his own neck.

Things were going along nicely with Don Jesús, one up on Don Alfonso and one to go, when, as things frequently do, something happened. Don Jesús made two holes in one. When Don Pepe stopped the match it was discovered that not only was there a wound on Don Alfonso's right forearm, but a scratch on his abdomen as well. So the final score was three up for Don Jesús when Don Pepe called it a day.

Don Jesús and Don Alfonso embraced and wept on each other's shoulders. Don Pepe put the sabers away. They hadn't had such exercise since they served to determine whether Don Pepe or Don Carlos Terry was the island's best fencer. That was a long time ago.

OPPOSITION ALARMS FLORIDA DEMOCRATS

Their Platform, Not Erected to Withstand Republican Shocks, to Be Rebuilt.

FLETCHER APPROVES PLAN

Members of Party See Need Also for Strong Leader to Inspire Confidence.

By HARRIS G. SIMS.

Editorial Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LAKELAND, Fla., Dec. 6.—Erected in 1896 and only slightly repaired four years later when William S. Jennings was nominated for Governor, Florida's Democratic platform is in a neglected, weather-beaten condition. Upon it, party politicians have paraded for more than a quarter of a century through campaigns which, due to the absence of Republican strength, have largely been offensive affairs. Not even temporary props proferred by the more vigilant Democrats will suffice if Republican aggressiveness continues at its present rate.

There must be a new structure from which Democrats may maintain their own position and fight back Republican attacks; and there is going to be one if awakened Democrats have their way, for they are beginning to discern the inadequacy of the party principles adopted years ago.

Editor Sounds Call.

E. D. Lambright, editor of The Tampa Tribune and one of Florida's more vigilant Democratic guards, has sounded the party tocsin with his editorial hammer. He would call party members together for a convention in January.

Senator Duncan U. Fletcher is entirely in accord with the plan for a stronger platform. In fact, he has greeted the suggestion with enthusiasm, but is somewhat ruffled over the indictment that the State party has been groping upon an uncharted course all these years. He says the national conventions have amply set forth party principles, but he agrees that Florida Democrats are in great need of solidarity.

The aggressive tactics of W. J. Howey, Republican candidate for governor in the last election, and E. E. Callaway, State chairman of the Republicans, have served the dual purpose of rallying both Republicans and Democrats. Prior to 1928, Florida had no occasion to consider Republican opposition, for there was no such opposition. But Democrats properly foresee reinforced opposition in the elections of 1930 to fill State and national offices.

Fruit Fly a Faction.

Recent announcement that Chairman Callaway will continue at his post until the Mediterranean fruit fly problem is nearer solution is being interpreted by Democrats as bearing more State political significance than appears on the surface. Though defeated, Mr. Howey has lost none of his party enthusiasm, and his handiwork is to be observed in present activities of his party.

Mr. Callaway's recent charge that the fly problem was merely a hoax perpetrated by Democrats apparently exploded without inflicting a great deal of damage. However, it served to remind Democrats, that, had the charge been one worthy of retort, they were not sufficiently organized to speak as a unified State organization.

Anyway, the open aggressiveness of Republicans has led ingenuous Democrats to speak out their lament that they are sadly in need of a leader who can inspire enough confidence to lead them out of the wilderness.

WILL DEBATE RUTGERS.

Fordham to Open Season at New Brunswick Feb. 17.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Dec. 6.—Fordham will meet Rutgers at New Brunswick on Feb. 17 in the first debate on the Rutgers schedule, which includes nine home and five New York contests.

The Rutgers debates will be based on the two questions, "Instalment Plan Buying" and "Government Ownership of Hydroelectric Power."

The squad is composed of ten men, all of whom have had experience in intercollegiate debating.

Two debates, one with the University of Florida and the other with Southwestern Reserve, have not been scheduled for definite dates, but the contests definitely listed are:

At New Brunswick: Fordham, Feb. 17; Lafayette, Feb. 19; New York University, Feb. 24; Gettysburg, March 3; Middlebury, March 27; Western Reserve, April 3; Boston University, April 11.

The New York State debates are: Union, March 17; Albany Law School, March 18; Buffalo, March 19; Syracuse, March 20; Colgate, March 21.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

NATURAL GAS GIVES CHEER TO ST. LOUIS

Completion of Pipe Line From the South Seen as Means of Abating Smoke Nuisance.

INDUSTRIES USE NEW FUEL

Rate War May Result From Competition With Cheap Soft Coal From Illinois.

By LOUIS LA COSS.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ST. LOUIS, Dec. 5.—Natural gas for St. Louis industries became an accomplished fact this week when the Mississippi River Fuel Company established service connection with the Scullin Steel Company from its 431-mile pipe line which has been laid north from the Monroe and Richland fields in Louisiana. By this action natural gas as a cheap fuel for industries of the greater St. Louis area comes into direct competition with the bituminous coal fields of Southern Illinois, and in some quarters a rate war is regarded as a possibility, as neither commodity comes within the regulatory powers of the State.

Other connections are to be made as soon as possible, as it is understood that more than 50 per cent of the pipe line's daily capacity of 100,000,000 cubic feet has been contracted for by various industries.

The Mississippi River Fuel Company is owned by the companies which operate in the Louisiana fields from which the natural gas is secured. These include the Electric Light and Power Corporation, Columbian Carbon Company, Palmer Corporation, United Carbon Company, Moody-Seagraves Company and the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey. Christy Payne of Pittsburgh is the president, and headquarters office here is in charge of B. C. Comfort.

Line Cost $30,000,000.

The pipe line, completed since April at a cost of about $30,000,000, is 22 inches in diameter and is equipped with five compressor stations at intervals along its right of way. These stations develop 6,000 horsepower each and force the gas through the main. The right of way for the line was purchased outright by the company.

The pipe line will serve the greater St. Louis industrial area, including East St. Louis, Granite City and Alton. The Southern terminus of the line is at Perryville, La., and it is estimated that gas entering the main there will be in St. Louis twenty-four hours later. The gas tests about 1,000 British thermal units a cubic foot.

Although the number of industries supplied with natural gas is comparatively small, the entry of this fuel into the industrial life of the city is being watched with much interest, especially by those concerned with smoke abatement. It has long been the idea of persons who have studied the smoke problem here—St. Louis has been described as the dirtiest city in the United States—that one of the chief contributing factors is the use of low-grade, cheap coal from the near-by Illinois fields. This gives off heavy, acrid smoke that, as soon as Winter sets in, hangs like a pall over the city except for brief intervals when a welcome shift of wind clears the skies.

It is not anticipated, of course, that natural gas will at any time supplant coal as the chief fuel here, but it is believed that with its increasing use the smoke problem will become less acute. The Civic Smoke Abatement Committee that has been functioning with indifferent results for several years is again engaged in a periodic appeal to coal users to regulate their furnaces in such fashion that there will be more heat and less smoke. Several arrests have been made under a city ordinance that grants the committee that privilege, and several boilers have been sealed, but the unprejudiced observer will admit that there is still a long, grimy Winter ahead of St. Louis.

SKIRT EDICT TO BE DEBATED

Women's Federation Sponsors a Forum on Long Vs. Short Dresses.

The present long-skirt vogue will be the subject of a style forum to be held next Thursday afternoon at the Home Making Centre, Grand Central Palace, under the auspices of the New York State Federation of Women's Clubs. Two young women will debate the merits of long and short skirts. Miss Rita Weiman, short-story writer and playwright, will defend short skirts and Miss Gertrude Lawrence, British actress, long ones.

All the women of the city are invited to attend the forum and, after the debate, ask questions, Mrs. William Dick Sporborg, first vice president of the federation and presiding officer at the forum, said yesterday. The forum, federation leaders said, would be held because of obvious dissatisfaction among New York women as a result of the new style edict.

CALIFORNIA IS ASKED TO BAR SALT WATER

Sacramento Delta Farmers and Suisun Bay Industries Are Damaged by Inflow.

CAUSED BY RIVER DIVERSION

San Francisco Wants Costly Dam Built to Keep Sea Water Out in Dry Seasons.

By FREDERICK F. FORBES.

Editorial Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 3.—Speaking about the weather, something unusual in California, it has been rather dry of late. But our weather is not like Mark Twain's. We have a feeling out here that something can be done about it. That something may not change the report of the weather bureau, but it can change the effect of a dry spell on the daily life of whole communities.

For instance, when a farmer in the Sacramento River Delta finds that his irrigation ditch is propagating soused mackerel, or when an industry on Suisun Bay—which is the upper reach of San Francisco Bay—discovers that it is making salt, although the formula calls for sugar, each is certain not only that something can be done about it, but should be done as soon as possible.

That something is the much discussed "salt water barrier," which, strictly speaking, is a project to build a dam across one of the two straits that link lower San Francisco Bay with the two consecutive divisions forming its northeastern part.

A Duty of the State.

There are two phases of the salt water barrier idea. The first is the plain duty of the State to protect the communities on Suisun Bay and in the delta region from injury by a policy established and fostered by the State. The second is that the barrier would create a fresh water lake which would stimulate the development of the great industrial community of which San Francisco is the financial and commercial centre.

What the State owes to the communities menaced by the invasion of salt water is not a matter for debate. Everybody concedes it. The debate arises only from disagreement as to what is the best method of affording the protection needed.

The influx of salt water into the delta area is due to the diversion of the natural flow of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers. If the water were permitted to come down the streams it would form a natural barrier against the infusion of the salt. But the irrigation which has made the valleys of these two rivers rich agricultural regions has left the industries, irrigation projects and domestic water supply of the Suisun Bay communities open to salt contamination in every protracted dry spell. Even in normally dry years salt now penetrates to the delta. It makes a serious situation.

Cost Would Be Great.

A barrier across Carquinez Strait would raise the water level in Suisun Bay and solve the problem. The work would cost about $40,000,000. The proposal has been enlarged to its second phase, which is that the barrier be built across San Pablo Strait, just above the Golden Gate, thus making a fresh water lake with an axis of thirty miles. The San Pablo barrier would cost $75,000,000 and might meet with opposition from naval officials, as it would be below the Mare Island Navy Yard.

Proponents of the barrier do not look to the State for financial support beyond the cost of protecting Suisun Bay. San Pablo Bay, lying between Suisun and the main body of San Francisco Bay is normally salt. But the inclusion of San Pablo in the fresh water project would be a tremendous stimulus to industrial development. The distribution of the added cost if San Pablo were included is a rather complex problem.

To get a barrier at all is quite a problem. While the obligation of the State is recognized, the expense is disconcerting. A comprehensive report on the State's water problems omitted the barrier and offered as a substitute a system of reservoirs on the Sacramento River. The idea was to store up water enough in wet seasons to flush the salt out of the Delta in dry seasons. But advocates of the barrier present engineering data to show that there is not enough water left in the rivers to do the trick.

A supplement to the comprehensive report contained the significant sentence: "The elimination of the barrier from the program at this time is accomplished not because of the lack of merit, but because of political expediency."

It is no secret that the expediency arose from the difficulty of getting support from Southern California for a project that would add so much to the industrial resources of the San Francisco area. The situation is attributed to indifference or lack of information rather than to direct opposition.

City Loves Its Southern Sister.

Despite the humorists, San Francisco does not think in terms of unfriendly competition with its southern sister city. When Los Angeles was making the fight for Boulder Dam, whole-hearted and unanimous support was accorded by San Francisco, which had nothing to gain. All this city saw in it was more water for its hard-pressed friends in the southern end of the State. We were quite eager that Uncle Sam should build the reservoir for them and were not greatly surprised at the later suggestion that the State build the aqueduct.

It is not admitted, however, that the State's obligation in the matter of the salt water barrier is on a level with its responsibility for a city's aqueduct. The State let the salt water come up to the delta. It is the business of the State to drive it out. That much is conceded by all hands.

Joining with the State to enlarge the benefits of the salt water barrier and create a greater industrial area is a matter for joint action of the San Francisco Bay communities. Joint action is the new slogan here.

President Hoover's commission to study the water resources of California and the relation of the Federal Government thereto may have something to suggest in the premises.

Radio Will Carry Greetings To Planes Aloft Christmas

SAN FRANCISCO (AP).—Christmas greetings to pilots on the San Francisco-Chicago air mail route will be borne aloft through the longest installation of radiophone in the world.

Ground equipment in fourteen cities and seven States and radiophones on mail and tri-motored transport planes are being completed for holiday service.

Wherever pilots may be on the 2,000-mile air span between Lake Michigan and the Golden Gate—and the higher altitude the better—they may talk to ground stations as distant as 200 miles.

Similar installation will follow on the Los Angeles-Seattle line.

443 TELL REASONS FOR GOING TO RUTGERS

98 Freshman Chose College Because of Courses, 2 Were 'Sent' 1 Wanted to Study.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Dec. 6.—Of the 443 freshmen at Rutgers University, forty-three came to the university "to get a good education" and to "better" themselves, while only three gave as their reason a desire to participate in intercollegiate athletics, according to the responses to the annual questionnaire, made public today. Two of the first-year men, answering the question, "Why did you come to Rutgers?" frankly admitted that they had been "sent."

The questionnaire reveals that ninety-eight came to Rutgers because of the excellence of the courses offered, ninety-four because of proximity to home, sixty-nine because of the reputation of the college and its scholastic standing, fifty-one because of scholarships, thirty-two as the result of the influence of family and friends, and twenty-five because of the democratic spirit of the university.

One freshman declared he came to Rutgers so that he might "go home on short notice."

One "aspire some day to attain the highest standard of manhood that exists by spending my four years at Rutgers"; another "to develop my body and mind," and another "to prepare myself for the higher, nobler things of life."

One freshman, more verbose than the others, explained: "I came to Rutgers because of economic, social and cosmic factors of which I had little or no choice. I came in order to learn to think for myself and to acquire control of mind, in training for higher forms of thinking in abstract terms."

"Rutgers seemed the kind of a college which would be in tune with my serious intentions as well as with my intentions which are not serious," another wrote.

A Vermonter favored "the idea of non co-ed," while another said succinctly, "I came here to study."

HOME-WORK AIDS BLIND.

Hundreds Make Articles for Sale, Report Shows.

Handwork done at home has become an increasingly important source of income for blind women and girls in Manhattan, it was reported yesterday by the New York Association for the Blind. More than 200 blind women, many of them aged and disabled, the report said, dispose of sewed and crocheted articles regularly through the Lighthouse.

Of this number, 100 also work by the week, the report said. In a special department maintained at the Lighthouse for the distribution of raw materials and for the purchase of finished articles as many as 275 dozen towels alone are received weekly, the report said, the number sometimes exceeding 320 dozen.

INDIANA HAS TIRED OF ITS CONSTITUTION

either directly or indirectly, is the utilities. Practically ever since the State established a Public Service Commission with authority to regulate rates, the utility question has been uppermost. Recently it flared into violent discussion when the Insull interests came before the commission with a petition to permit the merging of properties valued at more than $178,000,000. The utilities already have proved themselves powerful enough to sway the trend of legislation and it is taken for granted they would watch the deliberations of a constitutional convention with keen eyes.

The Indiana Bankers' Association has started an attack on the tax law, proceeding on the theory that they are unjustly assessed. Bank deposits in this State do not bear taxation, although under the constitution they are assessable. Frequent efforts have been made to admit deposits to taxation at one-fourth their actual value, but each time the farmers have howled discrimination. The bankers, too, would wish a voice in the convention.

In a general way those interested in writing a new constitution favor the short ballot, centralization of authority in the hands of the governor, departmentizing the government and an elastic system of taxation. Although the State administration has made no move to study changes in other States, it is likely that some of the organizations now sponsoring the movement will make an independent investigation. Particular attention will be paid to the State governments of New York, Virginia and Tennessee as the most representative of modern methods.

FULLER'S POSITION PUZZLES BAY STATE

By F. LAURISTON BULLARD.

who was defeated for the nomination in 1928, has yet to be heard from. Calvin Coolidge, whom The Boston Transcript named as the ideal candidate for a seat in the upper house soon after he retired from the Presidency, is enjoying his immunity from cares and responsibilities these days and mixing most agreeably with his friends throughout the State. These friends are of the opinion that he would not "consider" the Senate.

Fuller the Dark Horse.

There is small doubt that almost any member of the Massachusetts delegation in the lower house, with the possible exception of Mr. Treadway, and not excepting Mrs. Edith Nourse Rogers, would "consider" an opportunity to enter the Senate. There are able men in the list—Robert Luce, A. Piatt Andrew, Charles L. Underhill, Frederick W. Dallinger, whom Mr. Gillett defeated in the Republican primaries five years ago, and others.

But always the survey returns to Fuller. If he is not an actual but unavowed candidate, then he has played a part with great skill and with only the purpose of having the fun of the play. At the college smoker last week he charged the leaders of the Republican party with a massacre of men of whom they did not politically approve; they had "assassinated" former Postmaster Roland D. Baker, they had "assassinated" John C. L. Dowling, former chairman of the Finance Commission, and he named another officeholder as slated for a similar fate. These remarks were interpreted as indirect attacks on the men who appointed or selected the successors of these officials, including the Governor of the State and the Massachusetts member of the Republican National Committee.

The old-line leaders have to compute the possibilities of the situation, of course, always with the fact in mind that 1930 is to answer the question, Is Massachusetts a Republican State? Can the party afford to risk dissension if it can be avoided? The leaders may tolerate some things for next year that they would never consent to endure were they sure of their State.

'St. Patrick's Ship' Found in Ireland

MORNINGTON, County Louth, Ireland (AP).—Preserved in sand for nearly 1,500 years, the oaken vessel in which St. Patrick sailed to Ireland in 432 A. D. is believed to have been found at Colp harbor at the mouth of the Boyne. Archaeologists are studying the relic.

PARIS STOCKS DROP AFTER CRASH HERE

With Complete Upset of Values, Average Man Is Hoping Cost of Living Will Decrease.

BUDGET ASSISTS SAVANTS

$40,000 Set to Aid Translations—Deputies Would Compel Health Tests Before Marriage.

By P. J. PHILIP.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Dec. 5.—Like every other country, France felt the effect of the sudden revision of values in Wall Street last month, but it has been interesting to see how comparatively small that effect has so far been. For many months previously there had been almost no business on the Bourse, for the good and sufficient reasons that the French people are buyers of bonds and those who had the money and desired to speculate were operating in Wall Street.

Most of the French transactions, however, were eminently prudent and there was little loss when the crash came. But even the news that others had lost was sufficient to kill completely what little life there was left in the Bourse. Buyers fled to their dugouts and for the past two weeks values have been sinking lower and lower, with almost unvarying regularity, day by day.

From the sidelines the average Frenchman has been watching these events and asking if there is not in it all a ray of hope for him. Eleven years after the war he finds himself paying for everything far more dearly than ever before. Food, rent, clothes, amusements and even water and electricity are more expensive this Winter than ever before. But, with a complete upset of values and a decrease in the number of rich people in the world, he is wondering whether it is not at last to be hoped prices will follow shares down to a reasonable level.

Urge Cut in School Hours.

Much discussion is going on about the amount of overwork in French schools and the campaign for a reduction of the hours which French boys must spend in class has become vigorous. The pupils have, apparently, no eight-hour day. In class, according to one authority, they must do twenty-nine hours' work a week and, out of class, twenty-five hours—that is some minutes over ten hours a day. As most of them must travel some distance to school, their free time is extremely meager. As long ago as 1880 one educational leader advocated a maximum of four hours' class work a day for growing boys, but his advice has so far never been heeded.

There is no doubt the results of the present system are, in some ways, very good. The average boy from a French lycée, or secondary school, has usually both more extensive and more accurate general knowledge than any other. Those who are physically strong undoubtedly enter life better equipped than those of most other nationalities. But there are many who cannot stand the strain and the conductors of the present campaign for shorter school hours claim that both health and character suffer from the excessive cramming of the schoolboy's head.

Urge Health Test for Marriage.

During debate on the appropriations for the Ministry of Health in the Chamber of Deputies the idea was once more put forward, and this time received rather stronger support, that those who marry should be compelled to produce to the Mayor who marries them medical certificates of health and fitness, along with the other necessary papers. Pre-nuptial health examinations should, one Deputy said, be imposed in just the same way as medical examinations for the army, and only those should be allowed to marry who obtain certificates of fitness.

Of course, many arguments were immediately produced against the proposal, but it was noticeable that the idea is gaining ground and some day may be made law.

As the debate on budget goes on day after day in the Chamber, it is interesting to note how "socialistic" France has become in many matters without any one taking any particular notice of the fact that the State is now acting as the fairy mother in dozens of ways to citizens, and is doing things which in most other countries are left to private enterprise.

One appropriation of this kind is for 1,000,000 francs (about $40,000) to be spent next year on literature and literary research. There is an item for $5,000 "to encourage the translation into foreign languages of French scientific works," and a like provision for the translation into French of works of erudition written in foreign languages. A sum of $6,000 is provided to help young savants to continue their personal researches, and $30,000 is being set aside to start a fund for the encouragement and help of scholars and research students and to care for their families. The amounts are small, but in a country where special measures are being taken for the protection of the farmer and the development of agriculture it is gratifying that learned men are not being forgotten.

Hail Sewing Machine Centenary.

The centenary has just been celebrated of a little tailor of Amplepuis, Thimonnier by name, who in 1829 invented the father of all sewing machines. Thimonnier was one of those inventors who lived to see some profit from his invention and a great development in its use. But his start was not propitious. When he installed 100 of his machines in a small Paris factory there was a popular outburst of ill-feeling such as accompanied the invention of the spinning jenny in England. Led by half a dozen excited citizens, a crowd broke into the factory and in the name of "work for all" broke half the machines, which, they said, were taking the bread out of the workers' mouths, before they could be stopped.

German Mark on Souvenirs.

The German business man and manufacturer have evidently lost none of their ability to turn an honest penny by manufacturing whatever the public may want. It was with some perturbation, however, that some tourists, the other day, who had gone to visit Reims and stopped to buy souvenirs in the great empty space in front of the cathedral, found that the cigarette ashtrays on which were stamped views of the ruined cathedral, were marked "Made in Germany." They were not pre-war stock, for the cathedral was depicted as it was left in 1918.

Public Scribes Give Up Pens For Typewriters in Turkey

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Nov. 12.—Not long ago the public letter writer, with his inkpot and pens, was a permanent feature of every mosque yard. Today a new counterpart is making his appearance in front of the law courts, adjoining Santa Sophia.

It is the public stenographer, usually an unshaved, quite untidy youth, perched on a diminutive rush-bottom chair by the curb, with a portable table about two feet high in front of him and a shiny new American typewriter proudly flaunting the new Turkish alphabet resting on it. Passing traffic annoys him not. In wet weather he retires to the shelter of the handiest awning or covered area.

SAYS 5-YEAR PLAN RULES SOVIET FATE

Berlin Professor Holds Program Strictly Capitalistic, Though Goal Is Socialism.

FINDS AGRICULTURE LAGS

Dr. Hoetzsch Declares Russia Is Drifting From Europe—Stresses Bureaucrats' Power.

By GUIDO ENDERIS.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Dec. 5.—Discussing the present day problems of Soviet Russia upon his return from an extended tour of investigation there, Dr. Otto E. G. Hoetzsch, well-known parliamentarian and professor of history in the University of Berlin, expressed a belief that the final test of Communism lay in the question whether Russia could successfully survive the ordeal of the five-year economic program upon which it has been launched. The experiment, he said, was not altogether being carried out along socialistic lines, but was of a strictly capitalistic nature, although its goal was socialism.

The professor said:

"It is as yet wholly uncertain what the future holds in store for Russia or if this experiment in economics—the most gigantic ever undertaken in the history of the world—will either succeed or fail. This much is certain today: The present rule of the Communists is bringing about a profound change in the life and thought of the Russian people and it is destined to leave behind ineradicable traces. The brand of socialism which is being tried out in the Soviet Union is of Western European origin.

Sees Drift From Europe.

"Marx is the god of Russian Communism and Lenin its prophet, but something wholly new is being evolved in this Russian setting, but it is as yet difficult to determine whether the future of Russia is to be allotted to Asia or Europe. Yet it is certain that a gradual drifting away from Europe, whether conscious or unconscious, is already discernable."

Lenin, Dr. Hoetzsch said, had displayed a certain measure of opportunism, but Josef Stalin, the present dictator of the Soviet Union, showed himself an implacable foe of all theory.

The professor added:

"Stalin is a man of brutal will power who, in a spirit of complete renunciation, devotes himself wholly to his work. For him there exists only a simple, straight, general line of Communism for the Soviet Union and he is comparatively indifferent to issues of foreign policies. He brooks no opposition from the Right or Left elements of his party to the principles he pursues. As a result, his domination of the Third Internationale is gradually being forced into the background and is likely to be subordinated altogether in his determination to convert the present Soviet Union into a simon pure socialistic state.

Stresses Food Shortage.

Dr. Hoetzsch, who is counted among the Reichstag's best-informed authorities on Russian matters, was until recently a member of the Nationalist group in the Reichstag, but along with a score of its members he seceded in protest against the political dictatorship of Dr. Alfred Hugenberg. He has always ranked as one of the moderate members of the party of diehards. In view of his political prominence he expresses his views on present-day Russia with circumspection, admitting that the stage of evolution through which that State is now passing suggests it is yet too soon to hazard a prediction as to its ultimate outcome.

As for the economic relations of Germany and Russia, Dr. Hoetzsch is of the opinion that the execution of M. Stalin's five-year program will confer benefits on German industry. He points out that there is a chronic food shortage in all the big cities and that while industry may have attained its pre-war dimensions, the same statement cannot be made concerning agriculture.

"In putting his agrarian program into operation," the professor continued, "M. Stalin is proceeding with an almost iron consistency, but here everything is still in an elementary state. So far, only about 4 per cent of Russia's agricultural population has been organized into collectivist units. As for the popular opposition to the existing régime one sees little of it either among the suppressed middle classes or in the factional party cliques. The existing religious and intellectual currents are also not strong. The all-powerful bureaucratic-militaristic organization of the Soviet State, whose officials and confidential informers penetrate into the uttermost corners of Siberia, holds the entire Soviet Union in a firm hand, in contrast to pre-war Russia, in which the heavens were high and the Czar far away."

SOVIET REGULATES THE PRESS STRICTLY

Bans Private Newspapers and Censors Its Own Organs Sharply.

"SELF-CRITICISM" IS WIDE

Violent Attacks Permitted Within Limits, Beyond Which All Is Deemed Counter-Revolutionary.

By WALTER DURANTY.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MOSCOW, Dec. 5.—Although the Soviet revolution is more than twelve years old there still seems uncertainty abroad as to the extent of Soviet governmental control over books, newspapers and magazines. Only this week your correspondent received a letter from an American radical asking your correspondent to deny the assertion of a "Russian friend" that there is no "freedom of the press," nor are there "privately owned newspapers in the Soviet Union."

The writer implied with some indignation that this could not be the case because it did not coincide with his idea of liberty and enlightenment in the Soviet State. Alas, his Russian friend spoke the truth. Not only is no opposition organ of any kind permitted in Soviet Russia, but all newspapers and magazines issued by the government or party organizations are subjected to strict control. No privately published newspapers or magazines are allowed, but there remain a few private book publishers, subject to censorship, and they are rapidly disappearing through State or cooperative competition and the pressure of taxation.

Permits "Self-Criticism."

On the other hand, it is doubtful whether any other country in the world permits such violent attacks upon individuals and institutions—State institutions—as sometimes appear in the Soviet press. "Self-criticism," which is one of the Bolshevist slogans, often is pushed to limits which no Western libel law would allow.

The principal Moscow newspapers have a so-called worker correspondent attached to every big factory, and he or she does not mince words if a cause for complaint arises.

The Soviet authorities admit they will not allow the press to be used for hostile propaganda, or if they can help it for opposition within the Communist party itself. Thus one of the severest counts against the Trotskyist opposition was its use of an illegal printing press for flysheets to advocate its views. But self-criticism, that is, constructive complaints by the workers, has a free hand. It happens now and then that some critic oversteps the bounds of politeness or veracity.

The injured party can and does reply in the columns of the same newspaper with equal vigor, but the libel law as such never has been invoked, to your correspondent's knowledge, though actually such a law exists in the Soviet legal code.

Should it be proved that the critic acted maliciously or deliberately distorted facts, he incurs a penalty running from the loss of his job to a fine or a term in prison.

Fail to Applaud Their Airmen.

A curious sidelight on the Bolshevist mentality was given in a speech by Acting Foreign Minister Litvinof in the Kremlin Palace Wednesday, when he made his report to the Soviet Congress on behalf of the Foreign Affairs Commissariat. The audience, about 80 per cent Communist, greeted M. Litvinof's occasional and labored sarcasm at the expense of foreign powers, with hearty applause. There was one complicated jest about Panama joining the United States in the protest on behalf of the Kellogg pact, the point of which was in the word "Panama," which also means stock market panic or any big financial scandal.

But Litvinof's reasonable and, in the circumstances one might say friendly, reference to the growth of Russo-American business and to the value and extent of American cooperation in Soviet industrialization did not raise a handclap. Not surprising, one might think, in the middle of a fighting speech, but the speaker went on to talk of the "superb flight of our airplane, the Land of the Soviets, which has shown to Americans that we are not so backward in technique as some of them might imagine." But that, too, was received with absolute silence, although the speaker made the pause of a practiced orator expecting applause.

Yet they are immensely proud of their airmen, these Russians, a strange and inexplicable people.

Double Speed Is Urged.

Right now, in the midst of a herculean economic, financial, industrial and agrarian struggle, their answer to their own internal critics is "double speed, progress, double program to be accomplished." Thus the five years' plan originally called for a total oil production of 21,000,000 tons by 1933. Today Economic Life states casually that the five-year estimate has already been raised to 27,000,000 tons, and adds: "It now appears that 40,000,000 is the amount required in order to cope with the needs of 300,000 to 400,000 tractors which we then shall have and the foreign export program."

Yesterday Economic Life announced the appropriation of several hundred million rubles to build a pipe line from a port on the Caspian Sea to Moscow. Is it madness or is it the daring which the French Danton declared to be the key to victory?

Sofia Honors American Woman.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Nov. 10.—Mrs. Alice W. Manning, formerly of West Orange, N. J., and now matron of one of the residence halls at Robert College, has just been made an "honorary citizen" of Sofia, recognition supposed to have been accorded not more than a dozen times to foreigners. A few days ago, in token of this, she received a gold medal bearing the crest of the city and a letter thanking her for work she has done in Bulgaria for prevention of cruelty to animals.

Physician Cuts Red Tape and Aids Injured By Acting as Escort to Balkan Hen

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BELGRADE, Nov. 20.—How a scraggy cochin-china hen saved much suffering and probably the lives of several victims of a recent railway accident near Zagreb by propitating the great Balkan god of red tape has just been revealed in the Zagreb newspapers.

The accident occurred on an open stretch of line, and an urgent telegram was sent to the next village, where a doctor lived, summoning him to the rescue. The physician hurried to the station, but found that he would have to wait two hours for the next train. He was relieved to hear that a goods train was leaving in a quarter of an hour, and was about to enter the train when an angry voice called him back. Its owner was the station master, who pointed out to him that the railway regulations did not permit passengers on goods trains unless they were accompanying live stock.

The doctor's appeals to reason were vain. Nothing would induce the conscientious official to neglect his duty by permitting the physician to enter the goods van. The train was ready to leave when the doctor caught sight of the inevitable scraggy hen of the Balkans walking up and down the platform. Catching her and jumping onto the goods train were the work of a moment. The station master sighed contentedly, the doctor, as "escort of live stock," was admitted as a passenger in due accordance with the regulations, and the injured were enabled to receive first aid.

GRENFELL HONORED AS EMPIRE BUILDER

Britain Now Recognizes the Great Work of Labrador's "Ministering Angel."

NEW TRADE FIELD OPENED UP

Sir Wilfred to Start Reindeer Breeding Project—Talks of Harbor for Grain Ships.

By FERDINAND KUHN JR.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 5.—Sir Wilfred Grenfell, "the Labrador doctor," is on his way back via New York to Labrador in a new rôle as a pioneer of the empire.

For the last six weeks the British people have been showering him with honors and attention, primarily as the ministering angel who brought hospitals, orphanages and schools to the people of the bleak northern coast. But they have become aware of him also as a far-seeing production agent of what was once the empire's loneliest and least valuable outpost.

British business men who would not recognize a ministering angel if they saw one, have listened and been impressed with his story. They are beginning to realize that Labrador, too, is colored red on the map of the world and that its products may be important to the British Empire. The empire marketing board is eyeing the Grenfell settlements with increasing interest. Exports of Labrador salmon are being noticed more and more in the kitchens of London. England is now thinking of Labrador's timber, mineral and fishery resources as worth economic exploitation.

And England which for thirty-seven years has admired the little missionary now admires him doubly. The students of St. Andrew's University, Scotland, elected him Lord Rector amid scenes of tumultuous enthusiasm. Budding viceroys and governor generals at Eton welcomed him almost as a legendary hero when he came to speak to them. Sir Wilfred and his American wife have been dined and fêted at Mayfair mansions until they are both a little weary and anxious to see Labrador again.

Labrador Changing Rapidly.

"I used to know every one who came to Labrador," Sir Wilfred told the correspondent, just before sailing for New York. "But now there are too many. They fly over the Quebec forests into our back country to investigate the pulp forests, and they fly out again without my ever hearing of them. That, perhaps, will give you some idea of how Labrador is changing.

"At six places along the coast the wireless keeps our little settlements in touch with the outside world. We even have a seaport at St. Anthony, on the northern tip of Newfoundland, where there is a new haul-up slipway for repairing boats. Until this year we had to go to St. John's, 300 miles away, if anything happened to our boats."

Year after year Sir Wilfred has guided the progress of his schools, hospitals and cooperative stores along the coast, but now he sees Labrador reaping another kind of harvest. Before sailing he received permission of the Empire Marketing Board to establish an experimental reindeer breeding farm in Labrador.

"See what my friend, Carl Loheen, did in Alaska thirty years ago," he said. "The reindeer industry was just beginning. Nowadays he sends 5,000,000 pounds of reindeer meat to New York in a single year. We ought to be able to do the same sort of thing in Labrador. It is a wonderful reindeer country and our Labrador moss is ideal grazing ground."

Before the war Sir Wilfred began reindeer breeding on a modest scale, but poaching by settlers and the uncertainties of wartime interrupted the experiment. Some of the deer were transferred to Anticosti Island, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and Sir Wilfred will now remove them to a new reindeer farm.

Sees Harbor Possibilities.

A second project he is convinced will soon assume reality is a harbor for grain ships using the Hudson Bay route.

"As soon as the railroads begin running to Port Churchill," he said "Labrador harbors ought to become important ports of call in dangerous weather. The shipping companies have been thinking of Port Burwell, on the western side of Cape Chidley, which is the northermost point of Labrador. But if their vessels come through to the Atlantic side they will find long harbors with sheltered water deep enough for big ocean grain ships. All it needs is more accurate charting and mapping of the coast and I know what I am telling you will come true."

It will not be the first dream that has come true for this little Labrador doctor, who has not only seen a new country made fit for human life but has seen it become a producer of material goods as well.

As one eloquent London tribute to Sir Wilfred declared:

"Labrador has been a lamp whence a great light has shined—the light of practical ability fired by spiritual vision."

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

OLD MART PASSING IN CONSTANTINOPLE

Half of Shops in Noted Grand Bazaar Are Empty—Others Selling Cheap Goods.

ANTIQUES GETTING RARE

Tariff on Rugs Aids Turks but Bars Persians—Treaty With Russia Signed.

By LUCILLE SAUNDERS.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Dec. 5.—Frequenters of the Grand Bazaar, one of the world's most ancient marts, are noting with regret the increasingly large number of closed shops, due mainly to business reverses.

Foreclosures have been plentiful in the last six months, and antique goods are moving from the hands of the more picturesque merchants of an older generation to those of the decidedly mercenary dealers of the more modern shops outside of the Bezistan.

Antique statuary is not as plentiful as it was a few years ago, due mainly to large exports to Europe and America. Local auction sales dispose of fewer and fewer treasures for the collector.

The bazaar merchants fear that they are likely to feel depressing effects from the recent Wall Street crash, owing to cancellations of Winter Mediterranean cruises by those who sustained losses. Americans are the most liberal spenders at the bazaars.

Persian rugs are another item due to disappear from the bazaars unless a modification is made in the new tariff. The high protective duty which went into effect on Nov. 1 represented an increase from 3½ cents a kilogram to $2. Dealers deliberately accumulated large stocks, but, as in the case of other lines in which similar procedure was followed, this strained their financial resources.

Turkish Industry Aided.

The duty is reported to have had an encouraging effect upon the Turkish rug industry. Smyrna, for instance, exported $1,000,000 worth of rugs last month.

While the tariff will assist the modern rug trade, it naturally puts a damper on the traffic in antique carpets brought from Persia to the Black Sea ports of Turkey for sale in the Constantinople Bazaar.

With the modernization of business methods in Turkey, the Grand Bazaar seems to be following the route of the fez and veil. Its five miles of enclosed alleys full of shops are becoming more and more filled with glittering wares from Europe—saucepans, alarm clocks and second-hand furniture. Where formerly about fifty merchants did business in the most ancient portion—the old Square of Bezistan, dating from the Byzantine Empire—now there are less than half that number.

At one time the occupants of the bazaar poetically asserted that it housed 7,777 stores, but somewhere around 3,000 would be more nearly the truth.

The central rectangular portion in which is the Bezistan Square has the single-headed Byzantine eagle over the "Booksellers' Gate," which dates the building before the tenth century. At one time it housed such valuable treasures that a special surveillance gallery overhead was provided for police protection.

Now it is half empty and many of its wares are tawdry. It is probably headed for the same fate as the once picturesque Egyptian or Spica Bazaar, where furniture and bedding dealers have almost completely supplanted the purveyors of aromatic gums, drugs and herbs of the Orient.

Treaty With Russia Signed.

The signature of a provisional treaty of commerce between Turkey and the Soviet Government was accomplished this week at Angora, the pact to be effective for six months.

The agreement represents a victory for Turkish exporters. Hitherto they had been allotted only a relatively small quota of products which they could ship to Russia, providing they were armed with Soviet certificates. It was then discovered that certificates had been issued for more merchandise than Turkey had to export, and it was presumed that the wily shippers had been re-exporting products of other countries and profiting thereby.

Discussion at Angora resulted in the decision announced this week to confide supervision of this Russian trade to the direction of the Turkish Agricultural Bank and the Industrial and Mineral Bank, rather than to a corporation formed of exporters themselves.

By virtue of this accord exports to Russia were resumed. With the banks supervising Russian trade it is believed that this will eliminate in the future complaints that certificates were issued to persons not entitled to receive them and that products not indigenous to Turkey were being shipped to Russia.

The banks will form a stock company for the issuance of the certificates.

Turkey exports mainly oranges, lemons and olives to Russia and the trade is held to a minimum. On the other hand Turkey welcomes Russian products and its manufactured goods are plentiful on the Constantinople market.

ALEXANDER WELDS NATION TO HIS WILL

Former Separate Countries Are Made Into Districts in New Yugoslavian State.

PREMIER PUSHES REFORMS

Economic Progress Less Rapid With Foreign Capital Said to Be Holding Aloof.

By G. E. R. GEDYE.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

VIENNA, Dec. 5.—The Kingdom of the South Slavs has just celebrated an eleventh birthday—whether it can strictly be called its own birthday is an open question. For the country born eleven years ago as the Triune Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes is today the unified Kingdom of Yugoslavia, a change of name marking such fundamental schemes to change the country's character that if they were completed they would give it a new identity.

By the first birthday of King Alexander's dictatorship on Jan. 6 next, the process of the rebirth of the nation will be complete. As a birthday present it is reported that the dictatorship intends to restore some sort of modified constitution.

"A dictatorship of promises" was the designation applied to it by its enemies when it completed six months of existence last June. The dictatorship celebrated that occasion by issuing a "situation report" which contained only a meager list of things accomplished. Since then important changes have been effected which have created a Kingdom of Yugoslavia even if the final aim of creating a nation of Yugoslavians naturally is far from achieved.

Whether it is possible to make a man patriotic by royal dictatorial decree, even though it is impossible to make him sober by act of Parliament, the future will show.

What Has Been Accomplished.

Most of the conditions for creating a patriotic Yugoslav—on paper at least—have already been fulfilled. The names of the separate races composing the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes have already been wiped out everywhere and the display of their respective flags is prohibited. Even that apparently ineradicable distinction, the Cyrillic alphabet of the Serbs, is likely to vanish, as it is understood that King Alexander is about to decree the compulsory use of Latin characters throughout the country.

It is not historic names alone which have disappeared: in his determination to recast his kingdom, Alexander has flung formerly separate countries, such as Serbia, Croatia, Bosnia and Montenegro, themselves into the dictatorial melting pot to reappear in a mold of nine new banats (territorial districts), with an absolutely new administrative system of frontiers.

The new banats have a measure of autonomy, but as their autonomous bodies are nominated by the Crown their autonomy is more apparent than real and the central authority retains the fullest control. Bosnia is recast in particularly unrecognizable shape, its once compact block of Moslem inhabitants being distributed in tiny minorities among four banats.

The banishment of the ballot box extends even to the municipal parish councils. Not the remotest hamlet but is made to realize that there is a King in the land today upon whose personal will depends in the last resort the position of the parish pump. The tiniest potential Yugoslav has brought home to him or her the fact of the personal rule of the monarch. The former system of education in confessional schools has given place to strictly nationalist schemes insuring whether children are born Serbs, Bosnians or Croats, that they shall emerge from school complete Yugoslavs without a recognizable trace of racial origin.

The Sokols—those famous racial associations which combined gymnastics with the political organizations of the Slavs of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy against their German and Magyar fellow-subjects—have had to go. Their object—liberation and union of the Slavonic races—has been fulfilled, says the dictatorship, and they must be replaced by societies which will be a forcing house for Yugoslavs.

Apart from purely political aims, the Premier, General Zhivkovitch, who was entrusted by the King with the execution of his dictatorial policy, has set before himself the cleansing of the administration and the all-important betterment of the economic situation. Under the first head noticeable improvements are to be recorded. In his war against corruptness and slackness, General Zhivkovitch has made many unexpected visits of inspection à la Harun al Raschid to the discomfort of absentee bureaucrats who found their incompetent idling brought to an abrupt end. Whether his further aim of uprooting nepotism will be equally successful is an open question. That considerable improvement has been affected is certain, but critics say the nepotism of Serbian Parliamentarians has been partly replaced by nepotism of the dictatorial Yugoslavians.

Economic Outlook Not So Good.

In the economic field there is less progress to record. The international agrarian credit crisis continues to check progress, but worst of all there is still no sign even of a cloud no bigger than a man's hand to indicate that refreshing financial rain in the form of a foreign loan is likely to descend on the credit-parched land.

Foreign governments and, more important for Yugoslavia, foreign financiers continue to watch the experiment of Alexander and Premier Zhivkovitch with a certain distrust. They note that frequent demonstrations of loyalty and enthusiasm for the dictatorship are reported in all parts of the country, but they remember the existence of the iron hand of the censorship which makes the contents of the entire press worthless as a political barometer.

The opposition is silenced both by censor and by the absence of leaders since Raditch was shot, Pribitchevitch interned and others were forced to realize that their liberty depended on their silence.

However necessary or advantageous this severity may be for internal affairs, it naturally fails to inspire confidence abroad, where it is realized that only those views which meet the approval of the Yugoslav dictatorship can find expression.

Perhaps the country really is satisfied with the new régime as the tame newspaper columns suggest, but a real test of the genuineness of the loud-voiced enthusiasm is unobtainable. Meantime, there are signs that all is not going as smoothly as might be desired. One hears frequently of arrests of political offenders described as "Communists" who show strange unanimity in desiring to end their lives by jumping from prison windows or inviting a fatal bullet, which certainly reaches them, by breaking away from an escort.

Tongues will not be silenced which proclaim that these offenders are more often Croat nationalists whose desire to leave this world behind is not so strong as the determination of their police guards to silence them forever. It is officially admitted that the latest murder of police in Zagreb, committed by the same men who last Spring murdered Toni Schlegel, a friend of King Alexander and Premier Zhivkovitch, is the work of Croat Terrorists who were mysteriously aided to escape to Italy, it is asserted, where they immediately received the protection of the Italian authorities.

Belgrade sees close connection between Croat political exiles in Vienna headed by Dr. Antepavelitch and the Austrian Heimwehr. Baron Sarkotich, a former Austrian General and a Croat by birth, who is closely associated with the Austrian clerical newspaper, Reichspost, is supposed to be the connecting link between the two movements and a further link with the Hungarian Legitimists. Yugoslavia sees therein, despite the weakness of the open Austrian monarchists, a movement for an eventual Hapsburg restoration.

As against these anti-Yugoslavian undercurrents must be set many demonstrations of enthusiasm recently made in Croatia, especially the recent impressive anniversary celebrations in Zagreb and the declarations of loyalty and content made by such prominent Croat leaders as Dr. Rilig. But one remembers similar demonstrations of loyalty and enthusiasm for the Hapsburg régime in its last hours emanating from Zagreb and still wonders which express the true sentiments of the Croatian people.

Latin Quarter Youths Boycott American Products and 'Spirit'

PARIS (AP).—Latin Quarter youths have organized a secret society "against the American spirit." A boycott has been declared on American cigarettes, food, clothing, razors, movies and all else, but there is no objection to Americans buying the books, pictures or poems of society members.

Two items on the blacklist seem curious. They are American automobiles, which the average dweller of Montparnasse cannot afford, and "American alcohol," included by some one a few years behind the times.

The objection to the "American spirit" is that it is too material, without spirituality, ignorant and lacking in appreciation of beauty.

ANGORA PLANS BUILDINGS.

Parliament Structure and Official Apartments Projected.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Nov. 12.—Plans have been announced for the construction of a State building to house the Turkish Parliament at Angora. Advice of architects of international reputation will be sought. Surrounding property will be transformed into a public square. The site chosen is that of the old hilltop citadel, which will be made accessible by an electric funicular railroad.

This is the most impressive public improvement yet projected for the new capital, which only a few years ago was made up of shabby native quarters. It was a great occasion when Angora acquired a modern hotel. Now sites have been selected for erection of apartments to house government employes. These will be in the model section of the city behind the offices of department officials and will cost $4,000,000. Modern comforts and economic management, it is believed, will bring about a lowering of rents in the capital.

guarding the voice of impartial criticism and counsel elsewhere."

In the lobbies of Parliament the incident derives its greatest importance from the fact that the Conservatives and Laborites both attach relatively slight importance to the question of electoral reform, both parties taking the view that the appointment of the committee was only a sop thrown to the Liberals to placate them and keep them quiet while more pressing affairs are toward.

Lord Carson emerged from his recent obscurity to deliver what can only be regarded as an inflammatory attack upon the attitude of the Irish Free State in regard to the jurisdiction of the Judicial Council of the Privy Council upon matters which have not yet come up for final solution. Both Lord Parmoor and Lord Passfield reduced Lord Carson's rhetorical or hysterical outburst to its proper proportion.

Miss Bondfield Makes a Hit.

Miss Bondfield more than justified Ramsay MacDonald's selection of her for the post of Minister of Labor by the manner in which she is piloting the unemployment insurance bill through the House of Commons.

Both to Conservative critics who denounce the measure on the ground that it is too expensive and to Labor critics who call for greater expenditure of public money upon the relief of unemployment Miss Bondfield presents an impassive front and has shown on several occasions that she knows how to make that soft answer which turneth away wrath. More than one Labor extremist lost his temper during the debates only to find the Minister of Labor deprecating his attack on the ground that, like the pianist in Texas, she was doing her best withit he money at the government's disposal.

It is chiefly in the Conservative newspapers that the so-called "Socialist M. P.s' Revolt" is exciting any particular interest. The Cabinet is not seriously perturbed by the "breaches in party discipline" on which sensational headlines lay such stress. Ramsay MacDonald sees no reason why he should advertise either the Clydesiders or other extremists of his party by excommunicating them with bell, book and candle.

Morrison's Traffic "Bombshell."

Last among the figures whose appearance upon the Parliamentary stage attracted most attention this week has been Herbert Morrison, Minister for Transport. At first his rather vague announcement of a considered government policy for the solution of London's traffic problems was regarded as a bombshell, but it speedily became apparent that no very serious damage had been done or was likely to be done, at least for a considerable time to come.

Unification of traffic control in the metropolis is the desideratum of all authorities who have studied the question and the measure of public control suggested by the government spokesman really goes no further than was advocated by Sir Henry Maybury, who, while the Conservative Government was still in office, went to New York to spy out the land there and made a report which was embodied in a bill which had passed through its early stages before the general election put the Labor Ministry in power.

The difficulty before Ramsay MacDonald's Cabinet will be to evolve a scheme which will not only be a satisfactory merger of all the vested interests concerned but will convince Londoners generally that such a system of public control as Mr. Morrison appears to have in view will work out to the universal benefit.

There is little, if any, ground for the suspicion that this minority government will attempt to introduce even the thin end of the wedge of State socialism into the coordination of London traffic.

To Study Minority Problem.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PRAGUE, Nov. 20.—The Czechoslovak Minority Society has been formed with Minister Krofta of the Foreign Office as president. The organization will make a scientific study of the minority problem at home and abroad and seek to become better acquainted with the ideals and needs of minority nationalities.

ITALY IS APATHETIC TO LONDON PARLEY

point is conceded, Italy is likely to fall in readily with any reasonable suggestion made by other powers.

For instance, Italy hitherto maintained, and still maintains, that the limitation of naval armaments should take the form of limiting the total tonnage, leaving each country free to distribute its tonnage among the various classes of ships, as it thinks best. Italy is not likely to be too insistent on this point, if she finds general opinion at the London conference against her.

Excavations at Buthrotum.

In the first rank among archeological excavations deserving of special attention, are those being performed by an Italian mission headed by Professor I. M. Ugolini on the site of the ancient city of Buthrotum in Southern Albania. This interesting and little known Greek city is rapidly being restored to the light of day, yielding a wealth of valuable artistic material of the very first order, especially statues, but also affording archeological material for much interesting speculation. Only a small portion of the city has been unearthed so far, while the greater part is still buried deep underground, holding promise of even richer finds in the future.

The city of Buthrotum is interesting for two main reasons. In the first place, it is mentioned by Virgil, who has Aeneas pass through there on his way to Rome. According to Virgil, Buthrotum was founded by refugees from Troy, who escaped slaughter at the hands of the Greeks at the famous siege and who built Buthrotum to be a counterpart on a smaller scale of ancient Troy.

This story is confirmed by the excavations, which have revealed several striking similarities between Buthrotum and ancient Troy, such as we know it from the descriptions handed down to us. Much additional knowledge about Troy may therefore, perhaps, be gleaned by continuation of the excavations.

In the second place, Buthrotum bears traces of every succeeding wave of civilization which swept over that land. For instance, several implements of the stone age have been found, throwing light on the origins of the Albanian race, which is generally reputed to date from an Illryian invasion in a considerably later epoch.

Traces of every age have been found in Buthrotum, from prehistoric man to a Venetian castle, which still frowns over the ruins of the ancient city. In one short stretch of the city walls, typical constructions of the Greeks, Romans and Byzantines have been recognized.

The finds to date include a beautiful Greek theatre, with additions by Romans at a later age; a sacred well with numerous inscriptions and mural paintings; a Roman baptistry, with a remarkably fine well; a mosaic floor depicting Esculapius, god of medicine, and more than 365 votive offerings of people who had regained their health by worshipping at the shrine.

Exceeding all these in value are several extraordinarily fine pieces of statuary. There is a statue more than eight feet high of a female figure strongly reminiscent of the age of Praxiteles; there are two heads, molded with remarkable vigor, believed to represent the Emperor Augustus and Agrippa; there is an exquisite head of the "Goddess of Buthrotum," presented by King Zogu to Mussolini.

Some of these sculptures are believed to be almost as fine as anything found in the more famous excavations of Italy and Greece.

REDEEMING PLEDGES.

The Labor Government in England is already in the midst of a sea of troubles kicked up by a section of its own party, which charges that it is not keeping the promises made to the people before the general election. Mr. MAXTON is leading a band of sixty or seventy irreconcilable Labor members, who already speak of themselves as "a fourth party." Their defection would lead to Prime Minister MACDONALD'S defeat in the House of Commons were it not for the support which he receives from the Liberals, and for the abstention of Conservatives, who really have no wish to upset the Government at present and bring on another election which nobody wants. Meanwhile, accusations of bad faith are hurled every day at the head of Mr. MACDONALD and his Ministers.

Except for the violence of the language used, there is nothing new in this. Any party coming into power finds itself loaded down with pledges that are difficult if not impossible to carry out. The situation was accurately described more than sixty years ago by WALTER BAGEHOT in his book on the English Constitution. From it may be quoted the following, which reads almost like a description of the party situation in England today:

> An Opposition on coming into power is often like a speculative merchant whose bills become due. Ministers have to make good their promises, and they find a difficulty in so doing. They have said the state of things is so-and-so, and if you give us the power we will do thus and thus. But when they come to handle the official documents, very soon doubts intervene. Of course, something must be done; the speculative merchant cannot forget his bills; the late Opposition cannot, in office, forget those sentences which terrible admirers still quote. But, just as the merchant asks his debtor, "Could you not take a bill at four months?" so the new Minister says to the Permanent Under-Secretary, "Could you not suggest a middle course?" And the end always is, that a middle course is devised which looks as much as possible like what was suggested in opposition, but which is as much as possible what patent facts—facts which seem to live in the office, so teasing and unceasing are they—prove ought to be done.

Something very like that could be said of party tactics in the United States. The Republicans last year undertook to do many things which this year they discover to be beyond their power. In the matter of the special session of Congress, Mr. HOOVER made an unguarded promise which he gallantly did his best to live up to, though with what a painful result everybody now knows. Doubtless in the heat of a campaign party leaders will continue to make commitments which later will have to be scaled down. This is so regular an occurrence in the ups and downs of our political history that today it surprises no one. The only surprising thing is that politicians keep on promising what the people no longer believe they will be able to perform.

THE SOURCE OF LAW.

"Law," says Mr. HOOVER in his first annual message, "cannot rise above its "source in good citizenship—in what "right-minded men most earnestly be-"lieve and desire." Law was originally social habit. A law which has not behind it the majority of public opinion must necessarily fail. It is odd that the President should not seem to see the implications of his own statement; that while justly eager and energetic to enforce the national prohibition act, he puts his finger on the primary cause of its weakness. A multitude of good citizens did not and do not and will not desire or believe in Federal prohibition. It was a violent peremptory attempt to change old custom.

In at least the most populous regions of the country that law is without popular sanction. Moreover, the exceptions which it has been found necessary to make or allow, largely for the benefit of districts ostensibly Dry, have created in industrial communities a sense of injustice and inequality. The amusement or the indignation which the creation of a new sort of "felony" has caused serves to emphasize the difference which millions make between this law and other laws.

The desirability of prohibition in itself as a counsel of perfection, or even an ultimate attainable end, need not be considered. After ten years of prohibition its most convinced friends, unconsciously admitting that they have put the cart before the horse, are trying to "educate" the public to a realization of its blessings. This is a confession that the law was premature. Meanwhile, the results of that law, steadily enlarging that "education," have made new enemies instead of new friends. Legislatures and Congresses can make law. Only a preponderant public sentiment can make it obeyed.

THE HUNDRED NEEDIEST.

Again, and for the eighteenth time, THE NEW YORK TIMES lays before its readers the moving appeal of the Hundred Neediest Cases in New York. The full details are printed in the Special Feature Section of today's issue. There they are—the actual facts more eloquent than any comments upon them could be. They are much more than the "short and simple annals of the poor." They are the unadorned story of special need; the record of "children of misfortune"; cases of want and mute appeals for help, due to accident, or disease, or the death of the breadwinner, or any one of the multiple vicissitudes of modern life which may suddenly prostrate an individual or a family and make it necessary for those more fortunate to fulfill the law by showing in practical ways that they love their neighbors as themselves.

This particular charity has now become an established institution in this city. The organizations among which the fund is distributed, without the subtraction of a single penny for overhead expenses, have come to depend upon their share of the money in making up their annual budgets. But much worse than to disappoint them would it be to check in any way the flow of aid to those in direst need of relief. Their stories will be printed, at least by selection, in our columns up till Christmas Day, in the confidence that the generosity of our readers may be counted upon as in previous years. There is, to be sure, a feeling among many charity workers and societies that it will be peculiarly difficult this year to keep up the full range of subscriptions. This fear is based on the knowledge that many have suffered losses. But that very fact ought to give them a keener sympathy for those who have, through no fault of their own, suffered even more grievous losses. A person in somewhat straitened circumstances temporarily ought not to think it right to save at the expense of men and women and children still more straitened, and liable to be so permanently unless they receive assistance. At any rate, we are content to let the Hundred Neediest Cases find their way to kind hearts, convinced that even those who may think themselves a little embarrassed financially will have the grace to single out one or another case of extreme hardship and say, with Sir PHILIP SIDNEY: "Thy need is greater than mine."

SANITY IN SCHOOL SPORTS.

Two of the evils charged by New York State's director of health education against the conduct of athletics in secondary schools must be apparent to both parents and teachers of high school boys. One is that the publicity given to their football prowess often has an unsettling effect on persons of their age. The other is that the "championship" idea overstresses the importance of athletics in school life and makes football too rough a game for juveniles. In proposing an athletic association for the public high schools, Director ROGERS lays down a set of ideals which the school authorities and parents must approve, even though the boys may not take to them kindly. The plan must first surmount the opposition of the coaches, and must overcome the secret dislike of ambitious principals who like the publicity which winning football teams give to their schools.

Play for play's sake used to be the ideal of amateur athletics in this country as it still is in England. Commercialization of college football has not only changed the whole aspect from play to business; it has engulfed high school sports also. Newspapers, while they may with fairness contend that the amount of space they now give to school athletics is partly a response to growing public interest, have a share in responsibility for the existing situation. Long articles and photographs, accompanied by solemn "expertizing," about lads in their teens rushing a football up and down a field inevitably tend to give them a false conception of their own importance. Their interest is gradually centred on victory and championships rather than in the joy of the game. For many years college football has, by the testimony of many players, ceased to provide pleasure to the members of the teams; it is grueling, nerve-racking work under the interested direction of hired coaches out to make a personal reputation. Recently high school football has taken on something of the same color, and the injury to both health and character Director ROGERS believes to be great.

To form leagues composed of teams which meet on equal physical terms; to turn school games back to the players; to protect the boys from needless injury because of the "champion" idea—these are some of the ambitions of Mr. ROGERS and his proposed association. The plan has been tried to some extent in up-State cities, and the results have won the support of school authorities. The State director should be aided in his effort by the community.

IMPROVING THE FOREIGN SERVICE.

Details of the improvements in the foreign service which President HOOVER was known to favor were made public in the budget estimates for the State Department. The total amount requested is only $2,500,000 more than last year, but by the judicious use of this sum a number of important changes are to be effected. They should strengthen the morale of the entire service. If followed up by the suggested reorganization of the State Department and the foreign services we may expect to see this branch of the government made more efficient.

The additional appropriation is to be variously used. The salaries of the Under-Secretary and of the Assistant Secretaries of State are to be raised, so that they will be paid more than those foreign service officers whom they direct. This will also correct the anomaly of the Under-Secretary—who is second only to the Secretary of State—receiving less than his subordinates, the Assistant Secretaries. Funds will be available for the employment of experts from civil life, thus not only freeing for work in the field many of the diplomatic and consular officials now detailed for duty in the department, but making it possible to draw from a larger circle of trained men for the purpose of carrying out specific duties.

Fully as important are the provisions for additional "post allowances" for consular and diplomatic representatives. These are particularly necessary in some of the tropical countries and in the Orient. In too many cases representatives abroad of all ranks are virtually forced to pay for entertainment sums which take up much of the salary. It used to be commonly said in Congress that this sort of expense should be borne by the individual. But the increasing numbers of Congressmen who travel abroad have found that officials earmark an important item in their expenses as "entertainment of visiting Congressmen." There is, besides, the cost of receiving officials and distinguished persons of the country to which they are accredited. Whenever the American Governor General or Vice Governor of the Philippines passes through Hongkong or Shanghai on his way to or from the United States, the American consuls in those cities feel themselves bound to offer receptions.

It is to be hoped that the Congress will not attempt to pare down the State Department estimates as approved by the Director of the Budget. Should it do so, the Secretary of State and the President will doubtless do all in their power to rouse the country to the necessity of strengthening the State Department and the foreign service in every way possible.

SUB-ARCTIC WHEAT.

In the Johns Hopkins University Magazine is an account of what CHARLES E SAUNDERS has done to "push back the frozen circle of the Arctic many miles" and extend the wheat fields toward the Pole. This conquest has been achieved after patient experiments begun by the father and carried on by the sons in search of a wheat that would have the desirable qualities for milling and baking purposes and yet would ripen early enough to escape destruction by the frosts.

In 1903 Mr. SAUNDERS began to reselect the cross-bred varieties which his father, assisted by an older son in his vacations, had developed a decade before. This involved watching the development of each one of hundreds of plants; > noting the height to which it attained (an important item in the cutting), the strength of the straw, the length of time necessary for maturing, the size and weight of the grains, so essential in the yield per acre; the tenacity with which the seeds clung to the parent stem (again of utmost importance, since wheat which shed its grains on the ground before they were fully ripe, or during the cutting, meant an enormous monetary loss to the farmers), and, finally, when all these numerous qualifications had been combined in the same plant, testing the grains so obtained to see if they made white bread of the proper consistency and of standard weight for the amount of flour used.

He ingeniously substituted simple tests, chewing the grains and so determining their gluten content and the color and consistency of the bread they would produce, and thus shortened by years the period of the search for the short-seasoned, rustless wheat of desired qualities. In the end he found it. The "Marquis" wheat emerged from the hundreds of strains, but only by aid of the patient scholar. He is described as a "poetic dreamer," yet in one year 20,000,000 acres in Canada and the United States were sown in Marquis wheat. At the price at which the estimated product was sold in that year the total crop was valued at $2,000,000,000. The narrow strip of "habitable Canada" stretching across the continent has become "several hundred miles broader" as the result of the studies made by a "dreamer" on an experimental farm.

The poetic legend of St. Leonor which SIDNEY LANIER quoted in his unfinished lecture at Johns Hopkins University many years ago on "The Relation of Poetry and Science" could not have been more practically verified in real life. The legend told of the stags that came harnessed out of the forest and drew the plows of St. Leonor and his disciples till the stubborn soil was reclaimed and made a wheat field which in turn became the father of a thousand other wheat fields "and of a thousand "other homes, with all the amenities and "sweetnesses which are implied in that "ravishing word." The moral of the story was that if a man went forth sure of his mission in service to his fellowmen and adhered to it, the powers of nature would come out of the recesses of the universe, as the stags from the wood, and offer themselves as draught animals to the plow. The little field in which Mr. SAUNDERS made his experiments has become the parent of thousands of other fields up toward the Arctic, where the Summers are short and the Winters come early and linger late.

WAR AND PEACE BUDGETS.

When the Labor Government in the House of Commons rejected an amendment to the new unemployment insurance bill which would have added some $4,000,000 to the cost, a radical member protested. If war came tomorrow, he exclaimed, there would be millions and millions of pounds for it, but it is always thrift when it comes to "a war on poverty." It is a sentiment often encountered elsewhere than in Great Britain and among others than radicals. In view of what the nations have come to feel about the cost of armaments, one ought not perhaps to search too closely for flaws in the argument. In this country no greater a radical than Secretary MELLON called our attention to the fact that in 1927 out of every Federal dollar expended 83 cents went to pay for past wars or to prepare for future wars. In the 1929 budget the ratio was below 80 per cent. Out of $3,637,000,000 appropriated, the sum of $2,880,000,000 was for public debt, War and Navy Departments, Veterans' Bureau and pensions. In Great Britain the war cost was not so high proportionately. Yet the disgruntled Labor member might have shown that in 1928-29 the expenditure on public debt and defense was £425,000,000, while the contributions of the Treasury to education, health, housing, unemployment, &c., were £92,550,000.

Yet, in all fairness to human nature as of today, and in order not to make the outlook for disarmament too discouraging, it should be pointed out that very serious omissions do inhere in contrast between war against a foreign enemy and war against poverty. The big fact overlooked is, of course, that the central government's expenditure, at Washington or at Westminster, does not represent the entire national effort, or even the principal effort, for social amelioration and progress. In England we must add to the £93,000,000 expended on social welfare by Parliament the sum of £166,000,000 derived for similar purposes from local taxation. This would make the national outlay on social welfare almost equal to the operation of the national debt. British local expenditure plus central government expenditure on non-military functions would show that out of the British taxpayer's pound sterling only 40 per cent goes to pay for wars past and future.

If our own showing for military costs is nearly twice as high, the reason is, of course, that with us on a much greater scale than in England local effort and taxation take care of the constructive, social welfare, non-military functions of the Commonwealth. We have our States and our municipalities, with their separate budgets. These are devoted almost entirely to non-military purposes, whereas the Federal Government, after all, is charged by the preamble of the Constitution with providing "for the common defense." Two statistical tables in The World Almanac indicate a total for forty-eight State budgets of about $1,550,000,000 and for twenty-one principal cities of $1,550,000,000. These sums, expended on roads, schools, hospitals, public health, widows' pensions, housing—though, to be sure, on prisons, too—represent in a real sense war against "poverty." State and municipal budgets, added to the Federal expenditure on non-military uses, would thus show that of the American people's taxes at present 60 per cent do go elsewhere than in payment for war. The task for the future is to make it a higher percentage.

PRESERVING THE FRAM.

The Fram, a famous ship in polar exploration since she was built in 1892, calls up memories of NANSEN, SVERDRUP and AMUNDSEN. She was designed to withstand any pressure of ice floes to which she might be exposed, and is to be preserved for permanent exhibition if a fund for the purpose can be raised. A committee headed by Viscount CECIL will ask for subscriptions. The amount needed is £4,000. Norway cannot provide all of it.

The Fram ("Forward") had a severe test on her first expedition. At a dinner in this city last Winter Dr. NANSEN told again the thrilling story of leaving the ship in charge of Captain SVERDRUP, and, with Lieutenant JOHANNESEN, traveling for many days over the ice, meeting with an adventure with a polar bear and almost losing their kayak in the open sea. On Oct. 16, 1895, the Fram attained 85 degrees 57 minutes North, the highest latitude for a ship up to that time. NANSEN on the ice did even better, 86 degrees 14 minutes. In the most violent pressure the Fram "proved to be the very ship for ice." She was a snug refuge from the sharpest cold outside.

It was the Fram that took AMUNDSEN to the Bay of Whales in 1911 to make his march with dog-sleds to the South Pole. His base camp he called Framheim. "So the good old Fram," said AMUNDSEN in his book, "has shown the "flag of Norway both farthest north "and farthest south." When the South Pole was won, the Norwegians raised the Fram's pennant with their country's flag over the tent that was left there.

HOW TO CHOOSE POSTMASTERS.

Postmaster General BROWN closed his annual report without making any specific recommendation regarding the classification of postmasters. President HOOVER, however, in his annual message, recommended that the third-class offices be placed under the civil service. He considered this reform, which requires Congressional action, as one of the "commanding opportunities" for expanding the merit system. Now comes the Federal Civil Service Commission with a renewal of its plea that postmasters, as well as collectors of internal revenue, be admitted to the benefits of that system. Being something of a realist, and having noted that Congress threw the recommendations of his predecessors along this line into the scrap basket, Mr. HOOVER apparently prefers to take one step at a time. After all, what he proposes is a considerable step. As the National Civil Service Reform League points out in its statement welcoming the President's initiative, the third-class postoffices comprise more than two-thirds of all those still outside the pale. There is a measure now in Congress, introduced by Representative LEA of California, which would place all "Presidential postmasters" under the merit system, including those of the first and second class, as well as the third class.

Reform in the method of appointment has entailed a long struggle, and progress has been slow. Enactment of the civil service law a generation ago did not affect the selection of thousands of postmasters the country over. Fourth-class postmasters, those with an annual salary of less than $1,000, were appointed by the Postmaster General, while the rest were appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. It was not until 1908 that President ROOSEVELT, by executive order, began classification of this group which President TAFT completed in 1912. The rest are still commonly regarded as party spoils, although every President from TAFT to COOLIDGE has urged that they be removed from that category.

The system now in vogue is a compromise. The Civil Service Commission, acting under the authority of an executive order, holds an examination, and submits three names to the Postmaster General. In making his recommendations to the President, however, he is not subject to the restraints on the appointing power which outright classification would impose. President WILSON, during his second term, ordered vacancies filled by the nomination of the highest eligible. President HARDING revoked that order, once more subjecting the lists to political manipulation. Pending the classification of all "Presidential postmasters" by law, Mr. HOOVER has it in his power to restore and extend the Wilson method. The administration is worried about the postal deficit; here is one way of placing the service on a more business-like footing.

ACQUIRED CHARACTERISTICS.

Professor BLEULER of the University of Zurich, in his address at the dedication of the psychiatric unit of the Medical Centre, expressed the hope that he would find among American scientists, "who "are free from prejudices and obsolete "traditions," sympathy with his view that acquired characteristics may be inherited. European biologists for the most part do not agree with him, and he will doubtless discover that few American biologists do. He will, however, have many a priori followers among laymen, to whom it seems reasonable that the deeds done here in the body should so change the body itself as to affect that to which it gives life.

They will be strengthened in this opinion by Professor BLEULER'S inference from the remarkable faculties of the cells of the body. Every part of it in some way has knowledge of what is happening in every other part. If an injury occurs, the whole body seems to be concerned in its repair. The news service of the body becomes a "functional unit for the purpose of regeneration." Each participating cell undertakes its definite rôle, varying from moment to moment. A wounded finger is restored to its previous shape and size as if every cell knew exactly what it was to do in cooperation with the old cells and the other new ones. The cells seem to know the whole building plan in the reshaping of the injured part, yet without what we call consciousness.

Professor BLEULER argues from this that what is true of the cells is also true of the germs of life. Nature is more concerned in preserving the species than the individual, and it is not reasonable to assume that she will discard what the individual does through striving to benefit the race. And if one, still skeptical or wishing to be completely convinced, asks whether nature may not be trying to protect the species from the stupidity or the viciousness of the individual, the answer is that the germ cells as well as the cells of the body "are aware of the "needs of the organism and its new ac-"quisitions and are eager to give pos-"terity the benefit of these experiences."

It has been hoped by those predisposed to accept this view that Professor MCDOUGALL'S rats would by this time have completed their demonstration of the soundness of this theory. The centenary of the death of LAMARCK, which occurred Dec. 18, 1829, is only a few days away. At any rate, we can as human beings proceed as if the good our bodies achieve through struggle were not interred with their bones, and yet not let that theory dull our sense of social responsibility to the oncoming generation.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

A Bad Flying Country.

Many planes have been wrecked in the Pennsylvania highlands, which are characterized by heavily forested ridges with narrow and sparsely populated valleys between them, possible landing places being few. Fog coming down from Lake Erie often obscures the view, and in Winter the snowstorms are baffling.

E. E. UNDERHILL, a mail-carrier who learned to fly in the Marine Corps, had to make the passage through Woodward Pass one night in weather so dark and blustering that he came near losing his plane. COLLINS, a fellow-pilot, lost his wings in the same storm and saved himself by a jump with his parachute. "For night flying," said UNDERHILL, "you have to depend on the instrument-board when the weather is bad."

Early in November, WEBSTER, a veteran flier, crashed on Rattlesnake Mountain, overwhelmed by snow. He was seriously injured. BERTEAUD, who lost his life in trying to fly the Atlantic, had four planes wrecked in the Pennsylvania Alleghanies in one season. Colonel LINDBERGH himself has said that it is one of the most dangerous regions for aviators in the United States.

Draughts and the Common Cold.

There is something comforting in the assurance given by the United States Public Health Service that, after all, draughts may help to cause colds. That was good Victorian doctrine, and it would be a pity to see it swept aside by modern science and the tendency to blame everything on germs.

Draughts chill the blood vessels, the heating system of the body goes wrong, and then the germs begin to perk up. That, in brief, is the modern theory, but there is a good deal of mystery about it still. If just feeling cold made you catch cold, then the 85,000 people who saw the football game in the Yankee Stadium on Nov. 30 would all be on sick leave.

There must be other factors, some of which are still hidden. Perhaps the four-year research on which the experts at Johns Hopkins are working may reveal them. Meantime, Health Commissioner WYNNE's ten rules will serve. The main thing is to build up resistance by keeping fit and warm.

The Big Show at the Carnival.

Carnivals and tent shows are still doing business in those parts of the country which are not blanketed under snow. New Yorkers have little to remind them of the traveling entertainments that offer many small towns their only alternative to the movies. But there are thousands of people to whom the outdoor show is as great a treat as a fashionable Broadway opening.

Various kinds of chutes, rides and performances have their turns with country audiences. Just now, according to one of Variety's scouts, the great success is the embalmed whale. A California whaling company catches, pickles and ships the monsters to the carnivals. Sixty-ton whales are preferred. They are mounted on special cars with sides that drop down. Spectators walk around and stare but cannot touch, as a glass box encloses the exhibition. They stand in line for hours, pay their twenty-five cents, and gaze until hustled away by the officials.

While other attractions try in vain with the gaudiest posters and loudest barkers to draw a crowd, the whale does a land-office business. Variety says that at the Dallas State Fair it made $16,000, while all other shows lost money.

Antiquity of the Cliff-Dwellings

It is an apparent anomaly that in an area without forests the age of the cliff-dwellings and pueblo ruins should have been determined by trees. Yet this is what has happened as the result of work begun nearly a decade ago by Professor DOUGLAS of the University of Arizona, aided by numerous archaeologists, and now finally completed.

By studying the rings in the trees in the mountains of Arizona and New Mexico, and by prolonged observation of weather conditions, it was discovered that a definite relationship exists between the width of the rings and the nature of the season. Extensive comparisons of tree rings from different parts of the Southwest showed that the variations were constant throughout the entire area.

With this established, beams from buildings in the pueblos known to have been put in at a given date were studied and comparisons made with cross sections of beams used in deserted ruins. It has at last been possible to date almost with precision the age of most of the important cliff-dwellings in the Southwest. This runs back only to about the year 1000 A. D. The importance of this discovery will not be underestimated by students of archaeology and ethnology. It tends to confirm the comparative newness of the culture of American Indians.

THREE IN ONE.

The Soul is an illusive thing—
A butterfly upon the wing,
A thistledown tossed to and fro
By any phantom airs that blow;
The bursting glory of the dawn,
One moment seen, the next one, gone—
A streak of flame that sears the sky,
Benumbs the brain and blinds the eye,
A flitting flash that tears the night
And leaves it darker for the light.

The Body is another matter:
It makes its presence felt with clatter;
Cell calls to cell and stirs the deep
Wherein the Soul would brood and sleep.
I always know my Body's mine—
A canker gnawing the Divine;
I can't escape it for a minute,
And Mind and Soul reside within it.

I'm sometimes at a loss to know
Who is the I that feels the flow
Of Life that surges through my veins,
Bones, muscles, fibres, organs, brains?
Who is the I that feels and thinks,
That loves and hates, and eats and drinks?
Am I the Soul, am I the Mind
That in my Body are confined?
Am I imprisoned in the clay,
And beating at the bars each day?
Are Mind, Soul, Body so enmeshed
That I am Mind and Soul enfleshed—
An intermingling Trinity—
The Three-in-One and One-in-Three?

Temperature figures are off about 10 points from the seasonal norm, but the general climatic condition is regarded as sound.

It should be said of the millions of prominent persons who knew a year ago that the Wall Street bauble could not endure that their insight was only equaled by their sense of public duty.

Every time Mr. Vare of Pennsylvania recalled that he spent only $700,000, against $2,000,000 by his opponents, he was almost tempted to feel that he ought to have two or three seats in the United States Senate.

Concerning the late McManus trial, we always knew that the chances were slim of Mayor Walker being found guilty of murder in the first degree.

From his brief account of the South Polar landscape it could not have been a terrible effort to tear one's self away from it.

Byrd.

A thousand years from now the greatest geographical authority of the time will write: "Concerning the aviation record of the celebrated Commander Byrd (Bird? Beard? Brünhilde, as more consonant with Evelyn?), there are two schools of opinion. One insists that he was the first man to fly over the North Pole. The other maintains that he was the first man to fly over the South Pole. The truth very likely lies between these two extremes. We shall be safe in thinking of Byrd as the first man who flew over the Equator."

Will he dismantle the real estate development in Little America or will he offer it for sale at a sacrifice or in exchange for a thoroughly reconditioned used car?

The effect on international relations, it must be confessed, is bound to be more disturbing in the exploitation of the South Pole than in the case of the North Pole. At the top of the Arctic there is nothing but floating ice, and it is doubtful whether national rivalry will go so far to make an issue out of a purely mathematical formula like 90 degrees North Latitude. But at the top of the Antarctic there are mountains. Where there are mountains there may be diamonds and platinum, both of which are unfortunately transportable by airplane or dirigible.

F. P. A. in The World teases our closest neighbor, THE NEW YORK TIMES, by suggesting a petition to Congress to establish an East Pole and a West Pole. But why should that be necessary until Byrd has flown over Warsaw?

As part of President Hoover's plan for warding off unemployment by speeding up public works, New York City may soon be actually getting rid of its celebrated postoffice atrocity on Park Row. And who shall say that the result wasn't worth a shrinkage of $30,000,000,000 in stock market values?

French physicians recommend feeding iodine to oysters in the interest of public health. A quicker and cheaper way would be to administer the iodine directly in a glass of water.

There is nothing to the rumor that one of the new books was severely reviewed the other day by the man to whom it was dedicated.

Stimson.

When the Soviet Government has introduced the Roman alphabet of twenty-six letters in place of the present Slav alphabet of thirty-five letters, Moscow expects to be in a position to tell the American Government where to get off at considerable saving in time and expense.

What the Soviet Foreign Office would have the State Department understand is that when a capitalist government says peace it means war, but when a Soviet government says war it means peace.

However, it is only fair to the Russians to state that if it is no unfriendly act for one government to remind another government of its duty, neither is it an unfriendly act on the part of the second government to tell the first government to mind its own business. It is frankness all round.

And from this point of view Senator Moses did pioneering work some time ago when he insisted that calling a man the son of a wild jackass did not in the least constitute an unfriendly act. If he had meant to be really unfriendly, he could have thought of something sharper.

In general, let us not take too seriously the rebuff or the slap in the face or the cold shoulder or the icy douche or whatever it was that the Soviet Government administered to our State Department. In substance, the Russian message amounts to sticking out the tongue and ejaculating, "You're too late, see?" But if every quarrelsome government which sees a letter coming hastens to sign a peace agreement for the pleasure of sticking its tongue out at the letter writer, we may all reconcile ourselves to the humiliation for the sake of humanity.

The latest Chinese mutiny, on the basis of the information so far in hand, seems to be directed against the General who the other day raised the standard of revolt against the Governor who last week seceded from the Field Marshal who on Nov. 15 abandoned the cause of the Commander-in-Chief.

Consistent Performers.

In prosperity or depression Henry Ford raises wages, Andrew Mellon cuts taxes and Byrd flies over a furthest point.

Senator Borah thinks the World Court issue in the Senate will have to wait. There are ever so many other pressing problems which Senator Borah expects not to bring to a conclusion.

"Jail Needs Put at $30,000,000."—Headline. Unless, of course, Congress makes the purchase of liquor a crime, in which case it will be $30,000,000,000.

Possibly Mr. Edison has got rubber out of the goldenrod by thickening hay fever to the proper consistency.

A New York clergyman openly questions the validity of the assertion that the meek inherit the earth. Yet it seems to be the general belief that the meek do stay on the farm, while the bolder and cleverer brothers move to town and go into business.

One advocate of fair play for the criminal is anxious not to be misunderstood. "I hate crime," he begins. That is a creed which will not pass without challenge in the more advanced salons.

Timely Letters to the Editor From Readers of The Times on Topics in the News

STRANGERS HAVE HARD TIME SOCIALLY IN SMALL TOWNS

They Are Openly Hostile to Newcomers, Says One Who Prefers New York's Impersonal Attitude

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Very interesting and quite true was the recent article in THE TIMES Magazine asserting, against the frequent charge to the contrary, that New Yorkers are just as happy as other folk and in quite as wholesome and homely ways. No doubt a great many newcomers, single and married, find life in the big city rather lonesome and discouraging during the first few months, or longer, though that happens not to have been my own experience. I am pretty sure that for downright cruelty to the stranger New York City cannot compare with the town of 100,000 population or thereabouts

It is the small-big city that is really cruel. New York is impersonal in its neglect and indifference, but Evansburg—to invent a name, but not to exaggerate a condition—is personal and hostile in its attitude toward the stranger within the gates. New York may not hang out a welcome sign, but Evansburg makes it plain that you aren't such-a-much and you'd better get the idea that you're anybody at all right out of your head.

Jealous of Outsiders.

If you didn't have friends in Evansburg before you came, you'll wait a year or two, or maybe three or four, before you have a single genuinely friendly experience.

The fact is that the people of Evansburg are intensely jealous of one another and especially of outsiders. Call them suspicious and fearful, and you will be entirely right. The town is large enough to observe a variety of social distinctions, and small enough to take notice of every possible threat of trespass against them. It is a city of cliques, whereas New York is a city of circles.

The several neighborhood cliques watch you at a distance, size you up at a distance—whether or not you have a car, whether it is a cheap or an expensive one, whether your wife wears a fur coat, who goes in and out of your door, what kind of curtains you have at the window, whether your wife does her own work or has a maid. They discuss these vital matters and render judgment accordingly.

They are far more aloof, when you are sick and in trouble, than are the neighbors in a New York apartment house. That is the way it has worked out in my own experience—"What do we care?" in Evansburg and generous offers of assistance in New York. After a year in Evansburg, I came to the conclusion that even the New York subway in rush hours must be regarded as a far more kindly and friendly environment.

New Yorkers Not Liked.

The Evansburgians have a chip-on-the-shoulder psychology. Each is so afraid that the other fellow is going to assume a superiority or impute an inferiority that it has become their habit to belittle one another day by day in every way. The employe watches to get something on the boss, the boss delights to catch his stenographer or clerk in an error. The Evansburgian makes a great point of it if the visitor or new resident commits the heinous crime of referring to Washington Street instead of Washington Avenue. If the newcomer is from New York, it is worse. I never heard of an Evansburgian falling on the neck of a New Yorker, except with a meat axe.

The Evansburgians pride themselves on their spirit of independence. What it amounts to, however, by any civilized standards, is simply rudeness and discourtesy.

SEQUOIAS' RECORDS UPHELD

California Big Trees Said to Surpass Any Others In Age and Size

To the Editor of The New York Times:

A recent issue of THE TIMES commented editorially on the statement of Professor Herman Kurz of the State College for Women at Tallahassee that he had found a cypress fifteen feet in diameter and which he believed to be 2,800 years old and, therefore, the senior of the California redwoods.

Nothing is further from my intention than to joust with Professor Kurz on the relative attractions of Florida and California. But I must point out that, even granting the accuracy of the professor's observations, California may still claim to be the home of the "largest and oldest living things." There are many specimens of the California big tree, or Sequoia gigantea, which are thirty feet in diameter and over 3,000 years old. Judge Walter Fry counted the rings on one lumbered big tree and found the age to be 3,126 years. John Muir states that he found one in the Converse Basin, near General Grant National Park, with a ring count of over 4,000 years.

Possibly your informant had in mind the lesser species of sequoia, the Coast redwood, or Sequoia sempervirens, which, however, attains a dimension of some twenty feet base diameter and an age of between 2,000 and 3,000 years. There is often confusion of the two remaining species of that sequoia family which before the great ice age was widely distributed over the globe. Yet the existing species are distinct in foliage and manner of growth. The Coast redwood stump sprouts, while the big tree only reproduces from seed. It will be remembered that in his poem "On a Cone of the Big Trees," Bret Harte characterized the Coast redwood as the "poor relation" of the big tree:

I see all this, and marvel much
That thou, sweet woodland waif, art able
To keep the company of such
As throng thy friend's—the poet's table:
The latest spawn the press hath cast—
The "Modern Pope's," "the later Byron's"
Why e'en the best may not outlast
Thy poor relation—Sempervirens.

May I also point out that Professor Kurz's cypress is apparently yet standing, and long may it stand; but its age may not be determined until it has fallen and a cross section has been cut and the rings counted. A similar estimate might be made of the age of the Grizzly Giant in Yosemite National Park or of General Sherman, the President, the Abe Lincoln, or scores of more Brobdingnagian trees in the Sequoia National Park, which might conservatively be estimated at 4,000 to 5,000 years old. It should also be commented that in the moist semi-tropical climate of Florida tree growth is probably more rapid than in our own dry Sierra region, with its sparkling sunny Summers. But, there, I had better stop or I shall enter upon a debatable climatic question and drift far away from the big trees.

ROLLINS IS WILLING

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In the November Atlantic, E. Lyman tells the tale of an American college president who could not screw up his courage to decide whether to accept $40,000 ($10,000 a year for four years) from a father who wanted the college to "turn out a job" (his son) guaranteed "superior to the usual quantity product." The father said there were several colleges where he could approximate his desires, but none where he could get "a complete job to specifications from first to last."

May I accept this challenge to college presidents, which the author confesses he intended to be "provocative."

Rollins College in Winter Park, Fla., having a faculty selected primarily for their gifts of teaching rather than research; having abolished the lecture and recitation system in toto, where the professor is active and the student passive; having established in its place the conference plan of study, where the professor becomes guide, philosopher and friend rather than orator or detective-quizzer; having limited the students in class to not over twenty; having abolished the lockstep system of instruction so that the students progress according to their ability—and not en masse, the bright ones finding it so easy they don't have to work and the slow ones so hard they can't keep up; having put all the students on a required minimum of an eight-hour day, thus eliminating the loafer at the bottom and liberating the bright and ambitious boy at the top who goes ahead of his class; having inaugurated these and other needed reforms, Rollins will guarantee any student a "custom-made education" according to specifications, provided the father does not expect us to change the inherent quality of his son's mind, for that neither we nor anybody else can do.

Psychologists are now substantially agreed that the quality of intellect with which one is born does not materially change through life.

If this be so, then the boy who enters Rollins with, for instance, a third-rate mind cannot be graduated with a second-rate, to say nothing of a first-rate, mind.

But under our methods of individual instruction, where the relationship between professor and student during the working period of the day is constant, cooperative, informal, democratic, friendly and human, we can guarantee the father to turn out a boy (and in a process that is altogether delightful to him) who will come within 95 per cent of what that particular boy's intellect is capable of achieving.

And, incidentally, we will not haggle for the $40,000, but will gladly take the student at our usual rate of $700 per year for board, room and tuition.

A LESSON IN VENDOR'S MUSIC

To the Editor of The New York Times:

If a record should some time be made of street vendors' calls in this city—and it would be interesting—I would submit the following contribution from the east side:

On a cross street between First Avenue and Avenue A, I was attracted and puzzled at the same time by a peculiar musical tone, sustained and agreeably bell-like, which seemed to come from far away and yet to fill all the nearer air with its vibrant quality.

The last place for the source of the mysterious sound would seem to be a peddler's cart just turning the corner of First Avenue, but there the musician rode! The bottom of the cart was covered with straw in which lay an assortment of cheap white china, and the vendor to attract attention of housewives to his wares was repeatedly tapping one of his saucers held in his right hand against a dinner-plate in his left. He imparted a vibrating motion to the saucer, making the opposite sides strike the plate alternately, and it must have been long practice that enabled him to attain a motion so swift that it blurred the white circlet like the wings of a moth in flight.

The effect on the ear of this almost incredibly rapid percussion of the china pieces was the high canorous tone, suggesting a strange bell, triangle, or even the mellow note of a clarinet, and yet not quite identical with the product of any musical instrument one could recall.

And yet this was only cheap china at a few pennies a dish! But the orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera has no percussive instrument capable of duplicating that music somewhere between the woodwinds and the strings.

The east side china vendor's call has seemed to me also a kind of parable of life and character. When I am inclined to estimate an event or a personality as of little worth, "cheap," "trivial," "common," or some other easily employed adjective of disesteem, I hear again in reminiscence the high, sweet chime that the peddler elicited from a paltry saucer and plate.

Doubtless it is only limited perception that finds cheapness or ignominy in any place or human life. To a more expert and sympathetic touch, perhaps that of the Divine itself, the scorned instrument might yield some unique and entrancing melody.

DID BUST OF SHELLEY PORTRAY HIS DISGUST?

To the Editor of The New York Times:

A few days ago there appeared in THE TIMES an article in which it was disclosed that Mrs. Leigh Hunt had modeled a bust of Shelley which displayed him with a receding chin and a face decidedly unattractive; that Carlyle, seeing the bust, said "it looked as if the fellow had swallowed his chin and didn't like it."

Was it his chin he swallowed and didn't like, or something else?

Above all, Shelley venerated justice, freedom, beauty—everything noble and true. Surely it was a bitter pill to find himself repeatedly shunned, ignored, even attacked by those whom he wished to guide to heights as lofty as his own.

May we not hope, then, that Mrs. Hunt molded Shelley not as one "who had swallowed his chin and didn't like it" but as one with a bad taste of the world in his mouth?

FREE FOOD SHIPS

President's Proposal, Modified, Would Cut Need for Cruisers.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Certain genuine friends of peace seem concerned lest President Hoover's suggestion of free food ships should operate, if adopted, to insure neutral commerce with an aggressor nation.

Applied in the bald form in which the initial proposal was made it would so operate. But, in the hands of an international conference, the proposal would no doubt work out along the lines of the Wilson plan, namely, the seas free except as closed by international action, which rule, of course, would prevent neutrals from giving aid and comfort to an aggressor nation.

Of late we have heard little about the plan to weigh different categories of cruisers against one another—the yardstick—no doubt because it has been found most difficult to apply. One does not require to be a naval expert to realize that a cruiser carrying eight-inch guns may by keeping out of range sink any number of cruisers armed only with six-inch guns without itself suffering damage. The difference in fighting strength amounts almost to infinity.

Now, under the Hoover proposal, modified as above, a nation dependent on the outside world for its food supplies would cease to require cruisers to insure such supplies; unless it were an aggressor they would not be interfered with. It would, likewise, lay less emphasis on fighting strength because the United States would be estopped from trading with a nation declared by the League of Nations to be the aggressor and the danger of a clash between us and the League on that score would disappear.

THE HEART OF ROBERT I.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Concerning the disappearance of the heart of Robert I of Scotland (the Bruce), on which an article appeared in THE TIMES, one would gather that the missing reliquary had never been opened and that there is no certainty that it actually contained a heart. Was the reliquary a substitute, had the actual heart long since departed on a second voyage to the Holy Sepulchre?

This brings to mind that in the record of a meeting of the Royal Archaeological Institute, held Dec. 7, 1866, there is mention in The Archaeological Journal of March, 1867, as follows:

"Lieut. Col. A. Lane-Fox exhibited and gave an account of the discovery of a human heart enclosed in a leaden case in a church at Cork. It was found, about four years ago, in the centre of a pillar in the crypt beneath Christ's Church, Cork.

"The place was in process of being cleared, and one of the workmen, putting his hand into a niche in the pillar, discovered the heart. I regret that I am unable to maintain more accurate information as to the exact position in which it was found. The heart was opened by the gentleman from whom I obtained it and was found to be embalmed in salt. The weight of the several parts was found to be as follows: Leaden case, 5 pounds 12½ ounces; embalming, 1 pound 14 ounces; heart, 7½ ounces.

"The story supposed to be attached to the relic is that it belonged to some distinguished individual and was being carried to the east; that the ship in which it was conveyed put into Cork Harbor a mere wreck, and the heart was deposited in Christ's Church. At the time of finding, I am informed, a very thin coating of silver, much corroded, was found adhering to a part of the case.

"I find that the heart of Richard Coeur de Lion, which was found in Rouen Cathedral in 1838, was encased in two boxes of lead; within this was a second interior case and upon it a thin leaf of silver which time had in a great part decayed.

"The case, it will be seen, is 'heart shaped' and measures 8 inches in length by 6½ inches greatest breadth. It is similar in form to that in which the heart of Robert Bruce was enshrined, which Douglas wore with a chain around the neck, and which has since been retained in the arms of the Douglas family."

This account of an enshrined heart was printed many years before the finding of the missing relic.

THE BIBLE'S INFLUENCE.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

THE TIMES editorial about the historic influence of the English Bible on the life spiritual of the American nation, and its consequent place of honor in our national system of education, recalls to mind the noble tribute to this great book paid by the late Gino Speranza, an American, whose heritage of Latin blood and culture detracted not a whit from his deep and fervent admiration for our ideals and institutions: "The Bible in the American public school has been, both historically and spiritually, as much the symbol of self-government and of the national conscience as the American flag. It has been, in every intimate sense, as much a charter of American liberties as the Declaration of Independence."

Here is a statement the significance of which may well be pondered by the educators of our youth, remembering that it comes from one who declared of himself, "I am not, even remotely, of Anglo-Saxon or Nordic stock—but this is my country."

CONTROL OF POPULATION HELD SOLUTION OF BRITISH PROBLEM

Means of Support and Education Could Be Improved, but Lower Birth Rate Seen As Immediate Need

To the Editor of The New York Times:

While Harold Callender in his article, "Population Riddle Confronts Britain," in THE TIMES of Dec. 1, gives us much food for thought concerning Britain's population problems, he does not even allude to the biological control of population as a fundamental method of solving the riddle that confronts Britain and many other countries.

"Unless through discovery or invention there should come some unexpected increase in the resources of the country," says Mr. Callender, "the population probably will tend to stabilize itself at some point not far from its present proportions."

Mr. Callender does not suggest what means the British will use in stabilizing their population or what is likely to happen if this stabilization is not accomplished "at some point not far from its present proportions."

Not Subject to Legislation.

Birth rates are not decreased or populations stabilized by an act of Parliament. The birth rate of England and Wales has not decreased from 36.3 per 1,000 population in 1876 to 16.7 in 1928 by miracle. In 1877 Besant and Bradlaugh challenged the law against the spread of contraceptive information, and as a result of this victory the birth control movement throughout the world was advanced by decades. With the advance in the birth control movement the death rate of England and Wales decreased from 21.4 per 1,000 population for the decade 1871-1880 to 12.5 for the five-year period 1919-24.

As Holland took the lead in eugenics birth-control education soon after the Besant-Bradlaugh trial, the death rate of that country improved its position from ninth during the decade 1871-1880 to the lowest death rate in Europe for the five-year period 1919-24. The advance in Holland's position as regards the death rate and the infant and maternal mortality rates can only be explained in terms of a better biological control of population increase.

Notwithstanding the fact that 800,000 more persons are employed in Great Britain today than in 1914, there are 1,200,000 unemployed to be supported by government aid. Conservative, Liberal and Socialist Governments have all had their chance to solve the problem of unemployment in Great Britain, but none of them has accomplished much. Nor is any of these governments likely to accomplish much more than under-employment, which is as bad as unemployment, until one of them faces the fact that reckless breeding today is certain to cause unemployment and social unrest tomorrow. And when you have social unrest, war or revolution is not far away.

In the Matter of Population.

Some have contended that England and Wales are overpopulated, and others are quite certain that there is still room for many million persons. We shall get nowhere arguing over the word "overpopulation." If we mean by overpopulation the maximum population a country can hold, no country ever has been or ever will be overpopulated. Mankind would not stand for such animal-like conditions; climatic conditions cannot be held stable, and distribution of food could not be worked out to such a machine-like accuracy. Under conditions of absolute overpopulation, if the least little thing went wrong, millions or billions of human lives would perish in a week.

If Canada, Australia and Argentina were as thickly populated as China, millions of Canadians, Australians and Argentinians would perish each year when the wheat crops fluctuate.

Whether we call it overpopulation or population pressure, Great Britain and many other countries have more population than they can healthfully support and properly educate with the means immediately available. Of course the means of support and education can be greatly improved, but all this takes time, and population growth does not wait on improvement unless controlled.

What can Great Britain do to solve her "population riddle"? She can do everything she is now doing, plus the addition of a birth control clinic to each one of her many health centres throughout the country. The House of Lords has already approved of such a program, but, ironical as it may seem, the House of Commons, which represents the common people who suffer most from uncontrolled reproduction, has disapproved.

DRUG ADDICTS EXPLOITED

Change in Methods of Treating Afflicted Persons Is Earnestly Advocated

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Much has been written and said in recent years on the subject of drug addiction. During the past few weeks various organizations have voted resolutions pledging assistance to eradicate this scourge.

The discussion of this condition at meetings and conventions is a very desirable means of focusing public attention on it. But, if previous experiences are indicative of the disposition that will be made of these resolutions, then we must expect them to be forgotten.

Some worthy attempt should be made to put into effect the recommendations of these gatherings. In the past we have seen a great deal of welfare work for addicts performed on paper. The time is now ripe for some practical work.

The Commercial Side.

We are fortunate in having a few public-spirited men and women who are fighting against tremendous opposition to do something worth while for the addict. The only interest displayed by many people in drug addiction is a monetary one.

No one can ever hope to understand drug addicts, unless he or she spends considerable time among them. The fact that one has read a book or two on the subject, and spent a few hours in some institution with addicts, does not make him an expert. Obviously, welfare work of any kind among addicts, attempted by people who do not understand them, must fail.

At the present time the non-criminal addict in this city who desires a treatment—"cure" is a misnomer, for no specific is known—is faced with the alternative of paying a large sum of money, ofttimes running into four figures, to a private sanitarium, or, of surrendering to the authorities. In the latter case, he is sent under magistrate's commitment to a penal institution, where he is recorded as a sentenced criminal, and treated as such. Thus does society itself give a criminal record to an addict who has never before been in contact with the forces of the law, and who desires to make an effort to free himself from slavery to the drug.

A Habit, Not a Disease.

We must understand that drug addiction is a habit, not a disease. Then discredit the drug experts who use the misery and suffering of the drug addict, and his relatives, as a means of self enrichment. Follow this by extending a helping hand to those who can be helped, and we will have started a method that should produce worthy results.

With these things in mind, we might well adopt the slogan "Stop exploiting the addict," and get behind the genuine leadership that can be found in this city. In this manner we can help secure a non-commercial institution where drug addicts can receive treatment and rehabilitation. Then, and only then, can we expect to achieve some worth-while results from our efforts.

THE NAVAJOS HAD THANKSGIVING

To the Editor of The New York Times:

We superimposed Americans think we are unique in our observance of Thanksgiving Day, but the Navajo Indian has been observing a November thanksgiving as far back as tribal tradition goes. A series of thanksgiving ceremonies begins about Nov. 1 and continues at intervals during the entire month.

The Navajo name for these occasions is the Yabichi, which means a thanksgiving for the corn harvest—a general thanksgiving to the sun and rain gods for their respective efforts in aiding the growth of corn and grass. There is very little rain in Arizona and New Mexico where the Navajo Reservation lies, hence with the Western Indian rain is a constant subject for prayer. The Navajos living near mountains, where of course more moisture occurs, have constructed a rude irrigation system from the mountain streams and thus raise very good corn.

During the day set aside for the Yabichi the medicine men and dedicated officials of the locality hold a ceremony in which blessed cornmeal, corn pollen and feathers of the rain bird are used. Few outsiders have ever been admitted to these meetings. The same night begins a general good time and feasting for everybody.

There are contests between groups of singers and dancers representing various sections of the tribe. These take place in the light of a large campfire and, while one group is performing for the large gathering of Navajos who stand about wrapped to the eyes in their blankets, there can be heard in the distance the low rhythm of other groups practicing—a kind of backstage rehearsal. To me this low rhythmical rehearsal is more beautiful than the main performance, where one of the points of superiority is the loudness of the singing. The performers, who are always men, are almost nude, wearing only jewelry, feathers and fox tails. The performers keep perfect step and their singing is in perfect unison. A clown wearing a hideous mask always accompanies each group of performers and with his antics tries to confuse them.

Last Fall the Navajos who attained first place in the Yabichi which I attended were the Round Rock group. Our trading post is located at Round Rock and for weeks after this affair the Navajos who came to the post could talk of nothing else than their wonderful champions. These Yabichis last all night and indeed are spectacular in their wild, semi-desert, sage brush and sand setting, the flickering campfires shining on the crowds of brightly blanketed onlookers and the lithe, shining bodies of the dancers.

Once in a great while a weaver will dare to weave the figures of these Yabichi dancers into a rug. The Navajo believes that after death the spirit is likely to come back and inhabit the picture instead of the body itself.

AND NOW OLD SOL.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Earlier and earlier sets King Sol, our sun of day; later and later he rises, until the change on Dec. 22.

King Sol may well be called at this present time our "sky furnace." We need him more and more. Millions and millions of miles distant, King Sol is somewhat nearer to us in Winter than in Summer. He is a huge sky-furnace, approximating 1,300,000 times the size of our world. His fiery surface radiates a temperature of 11,000 degrees Fahrenheit. That is to say, were Sol to be covered with a coating of ice forty-five feet in depth, such an icy cover ing would be melted in one minute Our sun possesses a density a little greater than that of water. Were we able to live upon its surface, each of us would weigh there about 27 6-10 times what he or she weighs here.

CHOLOS ARE MESTIZOS AND ARE PROUD OF IT

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In a letter published in THE TIMES of Oct. 7 Timothy G. Turner of Los Angeles asks some one to "straighten him out" on the South American meaning of the "cholo."

El cholo is a mestizo, and is proud of his mixed white blood. He feels infinitely above the honest, plodding, old-type indio. He dresses differently, lives better and feels he is more highly civilized. In the Chanchamayo Valley of Peru, the indio, or chuncho, wears a loose-fitting brown robe and crownless straw headgear and goes barefooted. He does the lowest menial labor, whereas the cholo wears an adaptation of European garments. The cholo women of Southern Peru and Bolivia wear flaring skirts, high white kid shoes and picturesque white derby hats, and would be highly offended to be called indios.

AN ERUDITE PARROT

Chiquito's Recent Action Showed Unusual Perspicacity.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Chiquita, my tiny Brazilian parrot, does more things than many parrots do, and I am not a nature faker. She can talk, in a tiny voice, and she is the first parrot of my acquaintance that can sing. I can recognize some of the notes; others sound like those of tropical birds. This morning, at breakfast, it seemed to me that Chiquita's accomplishments had exceeded those of recognized avicular capabilities.

She eats her breakfast with me, does Chiquita, and when I am not prompt with her tidbit of toast, or fruit, or coffee—yes, coffee; Chiquita and coffee come from the same country—her conversation is apt to take a heated turn from her perch on one of my fingers. This morning, during an interval, her attention momentarily strayed from the quest of food to the front page of THE TIMES, which was lying on the table just below my left hand.

To the right of the page, in great black type, were the headlines beginning: "Byrd Tells of Daring Climb in Plane."

Chiquita looked hard in its direction. Then, a thing she had never done before at breakfast, she hopped off my finger and upon the paper. Slowly she walked, with every appearance of regarding the headline, until her left claw was just at the lower edge of the word "Byrd." She looked down. Then she turned her head toward me with what had every appearance of being a knowing look.

Of course, to claim that Chiquita could read would be absurd. But why did my bird choose just that particular morning to hop down from my finger and upon THE TIMES when THE TIMES is at my left hand at every breakfast? She had never before done it. And two cober, middle-aged persons, together with a German maid, were witnesses.

Did the long claw of coincidence have anything to do with it?

INCULCATING THRIFT.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

A prominent American financier, active in war savings, once said: "America is a nation of economic illiterates." The sad spectacle today of thousands with their savings wiped out quickly seems to confirm the observation of this leader of war thrift.

The writer has for twelve years been chairman of the National Thrift Committee of the Y. M. C. A., which sponsors national thrift week, Jan. 17-23, throughout the United States each year. The object of this movement is to help the individual and family to think straight and act wisely in money matters.

Readers of this paper may secure without cost from the National Thrift Committee, 347 Madison Avenue, New York City, a copy of an article by the editor of the National Thrift Week Budget Book, E. A. Hungerford.

BRITAIN'S CLIPPER SHIPS ALSO MADE SOME FAST VOYAGES

We Held Records for 24-Hour Runs, but the Thermopylae's Trip From England to Australia Was Smart Sailing

To the Editor of The New York Times:

THE TIMES printed recently an interesting letters from Truman Hensen in regard to the old clipper ships.

I think it is admitted by Britishers, no less than by Americans, that the development of the clipper type was almost entirely due to American genius, but since every notable improvement in naval construction has been, and is still, adopted by all leading maritime nations, including the United States, it is surely no matter for reproach to Great Britain that she profited by America's example in the design of her clippers.

If the British did not accept America's challenge in 1851, the reason is not far to seek. At that time they had no clippers worthy of the name, nor had they any organization like the American Navigation Club to foot the bill in the event of what must have been certain defeat.

The Thermopylae's Voyage.

It is fairly well known, by any one who takes an interest in the old clippers, that the American-built ships held the record for twenty-four-hour runs. It does not appear to be known to Mr. Hensen, however, that the fastest passage ever made from a British port to Australia was made by the British-built Thermopylae, which ran from Gravesend to Melbourne, pilot to pilot, in sixty days. The ships mentioned by Mr. Hensen—Lightning, James Baines and others—were all grand sailors, but although all of them were on the London or Liverpool to Melbourne run, it is a historical fact that the Thermopylae's record of sixty days has never been equaled either before or since by any sailing ship.

If Mr. Hensen, then, considers the Cutty Sark faster than the Thermopylae, he will have to admit that her claim to have been the fastest sailing ship ever built, while not entirely free from argument, is, to put it mildly, quite as valid as that of any other and has some little foundation in fact.

A voyage of approximately 13,000 miles is at least as fine a test of a ship's capabilities as any number of selected runs of twenty-four hours each, no matter how impressive these individual runs may be.

Good British Ships.

The great American clippers reached a high state of perfection, but Mr. Hensen would be hard put to it to substantiate his claim that any of them reached the pitch of perfection attained by such British-built ships as Port Jackson, Liverpool, Old Kensington, Glengarry, Ariel, Sir Lancelot, Taeping and a host of others. And when he speaks of the superior safety of the American clippers, let him consider the ship of which he is now making a model—the Cutty Sark. What American-built ship now survives which has braved the trades, the tropics and the roaring forties for over half a century, and is still considered to be able to put to sea?

It was America's misfortune that the Civil War put an end to the development of the clipper, so far as she was concerned, although the end was discernible even before that date; her sailing ships at that time were equal to anything afloat, but to claim that they were superior to their immediate successors is to enter the realm of fancy, and to present a case to which the only possible verdict is the Scotch one of "not proven."

HAND-PICKING A SENATE

Mr. Morrow's Appointment Arouses Desire for Improvement in Personnel

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In connection with the scheduled appointment of Mr. Morrow to be United States Senator from New Jersey, it occurred to me that twentieth century America may be in for a great surprise during the next few years in the way of an improved Senatorial personnel comparing favorably with the Senate of Webster's time.

Mr. Coolidge may become Senator from Massachusetts, and if this happens it may be possible to induce Mr. Dawes to run for Senator from Illinois—like Mr. Morrow—after the London Disarmament Conference has done its work. Pepper or Pinchot from Pennsylvania; Untermyer, Wickersham, Whitman, Smith or Young from New York; McAdoo from California; Baker from Ohio; Daniels from North Carolina.

Personal Choice.

A Senatorial roster with a galaxy of names such as the following would certainly heighten the prestige of the United States Senate to such an extent as to dwarf even the President of the United States:

REPUBLICANS.	DEMOCRATS.
Borah, Idaho	Alfred E. Smith or Owen D. Young, New York
Coolidge, Massachusetts	Baker, Ohio
Whitman, Untermyer or Wickersham, New York	McAdoo, California
Pepper or Pinchot, Pennsylvania.	Cordell Hull, Tennessee
Dawes, Illinois	Walsh and Wheeler, Montana
Morrow, New Jersey	Robinson and Caraway, Arkansas
Johnson, California	Daniels and Simmons, North Carolina
Smoot, Utah	Glass, Virginia
McNary, Oregon	King, Utah
Norris, Nebraska	Harrison, Mississippi
Couzens, Michigan	Ashurst, Arizona
Brookhart, Iowa
Watson, Indiana
William Allen White, Kansas

It is assumed that the service of Mr. Root or Mr. Hughes could not be contemplated, as the former is in political retirement and the latter is now a World Court judge. One might well fancy, however, Mr. Borah and Mr. Dawes as the Webster-Clay combination of such a Senate. Clay did the scheming, while the mighty Daniel did the expounding.

Higher Salaries Urged.

Along with the above picture the proposal sponsored some years ago by former Mayor J. Hampton Moore of Philadelphia, and recently revived in practically the same form by Senator Fess of Ohio, to permit retiring Presidents of the United States to become Senators at Large for the rest of their lives or for a specific tenure, should be enacted into law. Such a law would serve a dual purpose—take care of ex-Presidents in a dignified way and bring leading men to the Senate for solution of national problems.

In order to get these men into the Senate it might become necessary to increase the Senatorial stipend to, say, $15,000 annually, thus raising Senators above Representatives even in a salary way; Representatives at the present time receiving the same salaries as Senators, namely, $10,000 annually.

This may all sound like mere day-dreaming or intellectual romancing, but at least the idea is a mighty fine one.

WHITE WINES AND RED.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In the debate on prohibition at the Hotel Astor Dr. Wilson quoted Scripture to the effect that drinking was an evil. But he omitted St. Paul's advice to Timothy to "drink a little wine for the stomach's sake."

Dr. Wilson also repeated the reference to the wickedness of gazing on red wine. Well, there are some excellent white wines, exhilarating and by no means ungrateful to the palate. Does Dr. Wilson find any objection to them cited in the Bible?

PARIS YACHT SHOW BEGINS WEDNESDAY

Water Sports Are Arousing an Increasing Interest in All Parts of France.

REGATTAS BEGIN ON FEB. 15

Sportsmen's Craft Already at Monte Carlo for Winter Season—Huge Liner Planned.

By MAY BIRKHEAD.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Dec. 5.—Water sports and allied forms of recreation are arousing more interest than ever before in France. With the development of the motor boat the speed lover may risk his neck almost as successfully on water as on land. All possible water attractions will be shown at the forthcoming Salon Nautique, opening on Wednesday at the Grand Palais, where the automobile and aviation shows recently were held. This nautical display will be a fashionable affair this year, more varied and more interesting than ever. There also is much interest in the Nautical Fair at Toulon, rich in historical souvenirs especially of the Napoleonic era, beginning May 25 and lasting until June 9, where will be assembled everything interesting to fishing and pleasure navigation. Toulon Harbor, with its picturesque setting, is destined to become an increasingly important centre for yachts and other craft.

The Riviera, where many yachts have been at anchor in recent weeks, has announced the season's calendar of international regattas. The prizes aggregate 200,000 francs (about $8,000) in cash and cups, art objects, plaques and metals.

Tournaments Will Begin Feb. 15.

The excitement begins at Mentone on Feb. 15 and continues all along the Riviera clear to Cannes until April 11. Among the yachts already at Monte Carlo ready for the season are A. K. McComber's Crusader, a motor craft of 880 tons; Sir Harry Livesy's Jeannette, a steam yacht of 931 tons; Mrs. Reginald Fellowes's Sister Anne, a newly constructed motor craft.

Mrs. Fellowes is visiting America, taking the daughter of the young Princess Broglie, who is making her American début and becoming acquainted with American relatives. Mrs. Fellowes is half American through her mother, who was a daughter of Isaac Singer, sewing machine manufacturer. Her mother married the Duc Decazes. Mrs. Fellowes is a sister of the present Duc Decazes.

She first married the Prince De Broglie, by whom she had a daughter. Her second marriage was to an Englishman, the Hon. Reginald Fellowes. She is a keen yachtsman and spends much time at her Riviera villa, where she entertains many Americans.

The Duc Decazes, a well-known turf figure, also goes in for yachting. His boat, the Yveline, has just reached Monte Carlo and is anchored near his sister's. Others there for the season are Major L. Densham's fifty-ton motor yacht and R. H. Baldwin's boat.

George MacDonald's yacht, the Ianara, with Cardinal Hayes of New York and several other American prelates aboard, recently anchored in the harbor of Cannes while the party went to Rome and now is cruising the Mediterranean. They will return to Rome late this month to take part in the papal jubilee celebration.

Americans at Brussels Meeting.

Americans also figure notably at the meeting of the International Motor Yacht Union, now held at Brussels. The United States is represented by L. Lee Barrett and P. Bernard, who have just persuaded their colleagues to add three categories in accordance with the American practice in recent years. The meeting also voted on the mooted question of silencers, requiring them in all international contests after Jan. 1.

The French line's recent announcement interests traveling Americans. Not to be outdone by other navigation companies which are building boats for size and speed, the French Line has just let a contract for a new vessel bigger than the Majestic and swifter than the Bremen. It will be 1,001 feet long. It will have thirty-four oil-burning turbines, developing 120,000 horsepower, and will be capable of a speed of about thirty knots.

The Crown Prince and Princess of Belgium have been here for a week. They were guests of honor at a dinner given by Leland Harrison, American Minister to Sweden and Mrs. Harrison, who knew the Princess Astrid in Stockholm before her marriage to the Belgian Prince. The Harrisons are sailing for a Christmas at home on the Leviathan.

Mrs. Perry Tiffany has just returned to her Paris apartment, much impressed by the great interest shown in the Commodore Perry Museum, which she opened last Summer near Newport. It now is closed for the Winter, but she will return to reopen it on Memorial Day.

Mrs. Julian B. Allen has just joined the list of society women who have opened an attractive antique shop called the Chez Mer. She formerly was Mrs. Charles Dillingham and married Frederick Allen's son some years ago.

IBN SAUD IN PROTEST.

King of the Hedjaz Resents Move of Koweit Sheik.

According to a report from Jedda printed in The Daily Herald of London and summarized in a Jewish Telegraphic Agency dispatch of Dec. 4, there is a possibility of serious complications between Ibn Saud, King of the Hedjaz and the Sheik of Koweit, who is under British protection.

Ibn Saud's forces have been operating near the Koweit border against the rebels under Feisal el Dawish, who has met with heavy losses. The Sheik of Koweit says he is free to aid the rebels with supplies and to afford them asylum in his territory from the pursuing Wahabis. Ibn Saud has protested to the British Government against the attitude of the Sheik of Koweit, pointing out that the British Government ought to prevent the territory from being used as the base of operations against Nejd-Hedjaz.

Increased Electric Rates Turn Lisbon to Oil Lamps

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LISBON, Nov. 23.—The conflict is still on between the Lisbon Electric Light Company and the consumers. The Municipal Chamber recently authorized higher rates, and in protest practically all stores and commercial houses began to cut down on consumption. In many instances oil lamps were installed. The commercial associations took up the protests and several conferences have been held with officials of the light company, but up to the present nothing definite has resulted and business houses have decided to close at 6 P. M. on Saturday.

Dealers in lanterns and oil lamps are doing a big business and all available miniature electric plants have been sold by the Lisbon agents. The new rate is about 8½ cents a kilowatt-hour.

CHILDREN OF TURKEY WILL LEARN TO PLAY

American-Trained Teachers to Have Charge of Angora's New Playground.

WELFARE WORK EXTENDED

Kemal Government Plans Closer Supervision of Youth, and Especially Delinquents.

By LUCILLE SAUNDERS.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Nov. 20.—Teaching the Turkish child to play is one of the newest projects in this part of the world, and already it is experiencing a strong influence from America. On Oct. 29 the first model playground in the country is to be officially opened at Angora, as one of the features of the anniversary of the declaration of the republic. Trained supervision by American playground instructors has enlivened interest in the event and the park although in an unfinished state, has drawn as many as 452 children at a time on an average pleasant afternoon this Fall.

Actually the first playground, so designated, in Turkey was installed in Smyrna when Assiz Bey was Governor there. The apparatus was brought from America. All of the new equipment at Angora likewise came from the United States. Asa J. Jennings of the Y. M. C. A. assisted in direction of the Smyrna project and trained several Turkish instructors, who have since been transferred to Angora.

As yet Constantinople has no organized recreation work among children. Last month experimental equipment was installed in the park at Gulhane, but there is no director in charge of games and some of the material has been put away for the Winter.

Poorer Class Will Benefit.

To appreciate just what a great difference playgrounds will make it is necessary to know the background. The child of a prosperous family generally has a walled back garden to play in with numerous children of the household for companions, and various pets. But in the poor districts boys and girls usually run loose on the streets. Boys indulge in much good-natured cuffing and it is common to see a pair pounding each other and rolling in the muck. More recently those with pennies to spare have resorted to open squares where bicycles and motorcycles are rented out for 5 cents a ride, instruction gratis. Among the still poorer class many boys hire out as porters and furniture movers, a class called "hamals." They begin with light loads and frequent the markets, where they harass shoppers with persistent cries of, "Hamal, lady! Hamal, cheap!" You are suppose to hire a lad with a basket attached to his back, drop your purchases into the receptacle and pay 12½ cents to have him trot home with them.

These boys do not know organized games in the sense which we know them. Some effort has been made to introduce soccer, but it is quite likely to be played with a tennis ball down some narrow street.

Americans Aid Project.

It is through a group known as the American Friends of Turkey that the playground project is receiving much of its encouragement. In physical education Sweden and Denmark have been this country's models, but in social service work it is looking to the United States. Mr. Jennings has been giving all of his time to furthering the new movement, which is designed to make available to Turkey the social service experience of the Y. M. C. A., the National Child Welfare Association, the Playground Association of America and other similar organizations. American supporters are paying half of the cost of experimenting with and testing out the types of social service agreed upon by the Turkish Child Welfare Association and the American secretaries of the Anatolian project.

Twenty deputies of the Turkish National Assembly compose the central committee of the Child Welfare Association. This group elected five members to serve on a special commission, in company with a representative each from the ministries of education, health and justice, the Turk Ojak and the American Friends of Turkey. It is this last body which Mr. Jennings serves. Other Americans here are Ted Gannaway, formerly with the Near East Relief, and Barent Burhans, who arrived Oct. 10 from New York.

Help for Delinquents.

Another angle of social service has lately presented itself with the transfer of the administration of prisons from the Ministry of the Interior to the Ministry of Justice. This creates an opportunity to supervise the handling of delinquent youth and juvenile first offenders along the lines of modern correctional education, instead of by punitive measures. There are no children's courts here, but it is believed that the new law can be interpreted to permit judges to follow any methods agreed upon by the Ministry of Justice in accordance with the latest trend of social welfare work.

The government is now recognizing the importance of providing for the youth of the nation and the Ministry of Justice has decided to seek the opinion of an expert on the best methods to adopt here in cases of juvenile delinquents. American cooperation in this is quite likely to be sought.

PORTO RICO SEEKING A UNIVERSITY HEAD

Successor to Former Chancellor Not Available Among Island Scholars.

WIDE EXPANSION PLANNED

Institution Destined to Become Pan-American Centre When Politics Are Banished.

By HARWOOD HULL.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SAN JUAN, Porto Rico, Dec. 2.—Porto Rico is looking for a chancellor for the university and the general opinion is that he must be a continental American. No island son is believed to be available who measures up to all of the many requirements for an institution which the island believes must not only meet all local needs for higher learning but which is destined as well to become a Pan-American cultural centre.

The idea of a Pan-American university here has been discussed for many years and some definite progress has been made. Two years ago the University of Porto Rico celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary. It is the only institution of its rank south of Florida that is recognized by similar institutions in the United States. Geographically it is situated between North and South America and near to the other islands of the West Indies, most of them Spanish speaking. Many of the island's students and graduates have gone to the United States to take professional courses or post-graduate work. Many have remained there, more, probably, have returned here, while others are to be found in almost every Spanish-speaking country in Central and South America. Besides its liberal arts college the university has colleges of agriculture and engineering, law and pharmacy. Island trained engineers can be found in almost every sugar producing country in the Americas.

The present acting chancellor is Dr. Gildo Masso. He has announced that he is not a candidate for the chancellorship.

Roosevelt Sees Wide Benefit.

Interest in the possibilities of the larger development of the university was revived recently when Governor Theodore Roosevelt spent a day at the institution at Rio Piedras, a few miles from San Juan, and devoted much of his address to the students and faculty to enlarging on the Pan-American significance of the university. One graduate school already has been established, he pointed out, which will be of benefit to all tropical countries. This is the School of Tropical Medicine, under the joint auspices of Columbia University and the University of Porto Rico—the first school of tropical medicine to be actually located in the American tropics. Already it has attracted some of the leading research men of the United States and elsewhere and is making valuable contributions to the betterment of health and living conditions in the tropics. Students have come from as far away as India.

Cornell has become interested in the establishment of a graduate school of tropical agriculture and the preliminary details have developed to such a point that the undertaking is considered as definitely assured. Boston University has cooperated in the establishment of a College of Business Administration

But the revival of the idea of the Pan-American university has revealed certain local shortcomings in the present university organization which are causing much concern.

Dismissal Due to Politics.

The fact that the university is without a chancellor is due to the dismissal last May of Dr. Thomas Eliot Benner, now professor at Teachers College, Columbia, after almost five years as chancellor. As an island institution the university is supported by public funds, and is similar to most State universities in its government. Under the present law and composition the board of trustees is almost wholly political. The president of the board of trustees is Dr. Antonio R. Barceló, president of the Senate and for fifteen years powerful in politics.

Shortly before Dr. Benner's dismissal Dr. Barceló announced that either Dr. Benner or himself would have to go. Within the past few days Dr. Barceló has published in his newspaper a statement that were the matter now in his hands he would reinstate Dr. Benner. However, the difficulties leading up to Dr. Barceló's edict that Dr. Benner had to go developed at the last session of the Legislature when legislation in behalf of the university was finally passed by unanimous votes in both houses. The popular impression was that Dr. Barceló became fearful of the growing interest in the university as indicated by its strength in the Legislature—a force he finally ceased to combat.

Only since the Governor's visit to the university has Dr. Barceló publicly admitted that his part in the Benner incident, as it is referred to, may have been a mistake. Privately he has admitted as much before. But at the university the Governor said in very plain language that party politics should not be permitted to interfere with education, health or justice. Obviously he was speaking in general terms, outlining broad politics, but the student body, at least, instantly jumped to the conclusion that the Governor was criticizing the politicians on the board of trustees for their action in the Benner case. The Governor made no mention of it.

Benner's Return Possible.

Many persons believe that a situation has been created which might possibly lead to an invitation being extended to Dr. Benner to resume his duties as chancellor. Probably the really beneficial thing that has happened is that there is very general agreement that the university must be taken from purely political control before any outstanding educator can be asked to assume its direction.

Dr. Benner had devoted much of his time and energy to the broader phases of the university's future. He had made plans for the launching of a campaign for funds in the United States for university expansion and endowment with a Pan-American institution as his ultimate goal. Many leaders not only had become interested in the plan but had offered to cooperate in its development. Charles Evans Hughes was to head the committee. Unexpected developments here necessitated the abandonment of the project, temporarily, at least.

But out of the university muddle the conviction is growing very definitely that from now on the university must have governmental support without political domination. A bill will be offered at the next Legislature providing for a reorganization of the board along the more liberal lines of many of the State institutions. Once this is passed it is now agreed the way will be open to seek a new chancellor who may come to the institution with full knowledge of its future possibilities and assurances of united local support, admitted to be essential before any successful appeal can reasonably be made elsewhere for the development of a Pan-American university in Porto Rico.

COSTA RICA OUTBREAK LEADS TO PESSIMISM

Improvement Is Hoped For When Country's Biggest Coffee Crop Begins to Move.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SAN JOSE, Costa Rica, Nov. 28.—There is increasing pessimism regarding the immediate future in all lines of trade in Costa Rica, although many persons hope that as soon as the coffee crop begins to move in volume the present unfavorable situation will show improvement.

For several years overtrading has increased yearly, with indications that importations during the fiscal year will be greater than those of last year, which were the greatest in the history of Costa Rica. On Sept. 15, customs receipts were approaching last year's total. Unfortunately, too much of the importations may be classified as luxuries. Others comprise foodstuffs which Costa Rica should be producing in sufficient quantities to export.

Congress, in its determination to increase the wages of teachers, was the cause of the Secretary of Public Education resigning. The Secretary of Public Education, Señor Luis Dobles Segreda, stated that he would be pleased to see the teachers get more wages, but he felt that at the present time the finances of the government did not permit any increase in the budget.

Collections from abroad were very slow, and the sale of drafts has been greatly restricted, with banks selling them only to clients. A large commercial and private banking concern in Cartago has just suspended. The liabilities are said to be over $200,000, but the firm claims to have sufficient assets to pay all it owes.

Latest reports are that this season's coffee crop will be 10 or 15 per cent larger than last year's, which was the largest Costa Rico ever produced; but present indications are that prices will be about 15 per cent less. The increase in the crop may compensate for the lower price.

The banana output is decreasing rapidly, both in number of bunches and in the size of the bunches. It now takes about 25 per cent more fruit to load a steamer, and, as a result of the law increasing the export duty after Oct. 30, 1930, no new planting is being done, and the United Fruit Company is rapidly reducing operations on the Atlantic coast. It is hoped that an arrangement will be reached between the company and the government, but even in this event it will take at least three years to place the banana industry where it was when Congress passed the law. The President is reported by one of the local newspapers to have stated that in his opinion at least 90 per cent of the critical situation through which the country was passing was due to the banana law.

The Minister of the Treasury, Juan Rafael Arias, has arranged for a loan of $1,000,000 with the First National Bank of Boston. The conditions are similar to those made for a previously arranged loan for $2,750,000, entered into with the same bank, but which failed. Payments are to be made at the rate of $125,000 a month, and interest at 8 per cent, but no mention has been made of the rate at which the bonds are to be negotiated.

CONSTANTINOPLE FINDS HUMOR IN ROBBERIES

Thefts Range From Sheep's Feet to Money—High Cost of Living Blamed.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Nov. 12.—"How many people are in your house?" asks the innocent bystander.

"In the daytime," replies the householder, "we are five. But during the night this varies, depending upon the number of robbers who happen along."

So goes one of Constantinople's current jokes. A few days ago a newspaper printed a cartoon showing a resident leaving his home with two suitcases crammed with valuables.

"Where are you going?" asks a friend.

"Just to visit a neighbor for a little while, but I thought I'd better take all precautions," is the reply.

Constantinople's theft wave has reached the stage where almost anything portable is likely to disappear. This morning's police records show that during the night thieves removed the cables from the steamers Umbria and Prince Carol, setting the former boat adrift.

Yesterday's blotter, representing a typical day's work, shows the following entries: Moustafa arrested in the house of Sahak Effendi while packing various articles to steal; Davout, pickpocket, arrested shortly after stealing a purse containing $6 from a child on her way to school; Husni taken in custody for stealing a shovel in Scutari; Scrope in jail for stealing two rugs from a house; Ahmet arrested in the act of taking money from a woman's purse; Chatif, Ismail and Yahia arrested while stealing ninety pairs of sheep's feet from a tripe merchant at Balouk-Bazar; Ahmet, housebreaker, stopped while removing flannel coverings from bedrooms in a hotel.

About the most unpleasant reception any thief received lately was the one who entered a dark kitchen one evening and accidentally stepped in a pot of hot jam which the woman of the house had set on the floor to cool. Another made the mistake of climbing over a balcony and landing on the stomach of a husky man who had been sleeping there.

Robbery is a touchy subject with the police the last few weeks. Efforts are being made to clean out the known haunts of thieves, but economists do not think that the police can bring about the ultimate cure. It is pointed out that the cost of living is so high that if one fixes 100 in 1914 as an index number the present number is 1,400.

Portugal May Change Tariff.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LISBON, Nov. 23.—The Minister of Finance has announced that he will ask soon that a new decree be issued changing the tariff on various imports and exports. Portugal's imports are yearly larger than her exports. Cotton, automobiles, oil and gasoline are the chief imports from the United States.

PHILADELPHIA CUTS ITS 1930 TAX RATE

Annual Battle Results in Net Saving of 7½ Cents to Property Owners.

CITY TO COMBAT NOISE

Civic Organizations Select Auto Horns as Starting Point of Aggressive Drive.

By LAWRENCE DAVIES.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 5.—Probably nowhere else in the country, especially among the larger cities, is there waged in the open a tax-rate battle as spirited and as extensive in scope as that which takes place annually on the William Penn front. The Quaker citizen, who takes pride in his own two-story unit in a row of houses, and in his own tiny lawn with a shrub or two, now is watching the climax of the controversy in which he displays more interest perhaps than in any other municipal problem.

In some of the other larger cities the annual budget making, while an enormous task, proceeds in relative quiet. Here it is different. The tax-rate controversy, fought out, ostensibly at least, on the floor of the City Council and in long statements by opposing factions, is front page news for weeks.

Every section of the city takes an active interest through its community and business organizations, which number more than 100. At their meetings resolutions are passed and forwarded in batches to the City Council; administration leaders make radio speeches and representatives of some of the clubs appear on the council floor, demanding tax cuts or budget increases, and often both, in the light of needs, real or imaginary, in their own sections.

Decrease Is Demanded.

This year the contest started in September after budget requests of all municipal department heads had been placed in the Mayor's hands. A tax boost was reported to be inevitable. The result was a demand by sixty-five civic and improvement organizations for a substantial decrease in the 1930 rate regardless of the budget.

Administration leaders at first suggested that it might be possible to reduce the rate by 15 cents, but this was vetoed by influential Councilmen. Mayor Mackey early in November insisted on a 30-cent reduction, and the Sinking Fund Commission voted to release more than $7,000,000 in accumulated surplus for general appropriations.

The City Council, after some of its members had accused the Mayor of playing politics to create a good impression up-State, finally agreed this week that the rate could be cut 15 cents for next year, first heeding demands for increased pay for policemen and firemen. Unless the courts rule otherwise the Philadelphia property owner, therefore will pay next year a municipal tax of $1.80 on each $100 of assessed valuation, but his net saving will be only 7½ cents, because the school tax, which is in addition to the other, was increased from 90 to 97½ cents per $100.

Less Noise Desired.

Taking a leaf from New York's notebook, fifty organizations began a concerted drive this week to subdue the noises of the Quaker City. The motorist who sounds his horn at every street intersection or joins other motorists in a raucous concert during periods of traffic congestion is the central target, but loud-speakers, riveters, locomotive whistles and bells, elevated trains, newsboys, Fire Department sirens and trucks, milk men and airplanes are to receive consideration.

Ten years ago the law forced motorists to sound their horns at all street corners. A later ordinance, seldom enforced, providing fines for sounding horns unnecessarily, has failed to break the habit contracted under the earlier legislation.

Philadelphia, proverbially quiet, is in reality one of the noisiest of municipalities, the campaigners believe, and they have dedicated themselves in the immediate future to the work of removing a contributing cause of shattered nerves.

BERLIN'S NEW COUNCIL.

Labor Parties Made Material Gains in Municipal Election.

If the German Social Democrats and Communists were not at swords' points over so many questions of principle and tactics they could administer the capital city of the republic pretty much to suit themselves. Details of the municipal election of Nov. 17 found in the German press show that the gains registered by the Labor parties were greater than indicated by the first cabled reports.

Of the 2,293,665 valid ballots cast for members of the Board of Aldermen 1,226,189 went to the lists presented by the "Red" parties, and the Labor majority in the board was increased from seven to seventeen, compared with the results of the election of 1925. In the new council the Socialists have 65 seats, against 73 in the old body; but the Communists hold 56, against 43, making 121 Labor members out of a total membership of 225. The bourgeois Aldermen are classified as follows: German Nationalists, 40; People's party, 15; Democrats, 14; National Socialist Labor party (near-Fascisti), 13; Economic party, 10; Centrists, 8; Christian People's Service, 3; German Popular Liberal party, 1.

Among the twenty-two parties naming candidates for Aldermen were the Left-Wing (or Trotsky) Communists, who received 3,787 votes, and the remnant of the Independent Socialist Party, which won the suffrage of 5,072 citizens.

Turkey Turns to Sculpture.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Nov. 11.—A young Turkish sculptor has been engaged by the municipality to make a statue of President Mustapha Kemal. This marks an important event in Turkish art, for sculpture has hitherto been discouraged here and all of the statues in the country have been executed by foreigners.

DUBLIN PREPARING FOR PAPAL NUNCIO

But Political Difficulties Are Seen Ahead for Archbishop Robinson.

HUNTING IS IN FULL SWING

Many Americans in Ireland to Participate in Sport—De Valera Here for Loan.

By M. G. PALMER.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DUBLIN, Dec. 4.—This city is making elaborate preparations to receive Archbishop Paschal Robinson, first Papal Nuncio accredited to the Free State. The Archbishop is a Dubliner by birth, but at an early age he emigrated to America.

Before entering the Franciscan order in 1895 he was a journalist and at the age of 22 he was made associate editor of The North American Review. He made his mark rapidly in the Church by his researches into the early records of the Franciscan movement and in 1913 he was selected to fill the chair of medieval history in the Catholic University of America.

In later years he has resided at Rome and has been engaged largely in diplomatic work for the Vatican. Delicate as have been some of the missions which he has undertaken, it is doubtful if they made as heavy demands on his skill and tactfulness as the task confronting him as Nuncio. It is common knowledge that the Irish hierarchy did not favor his appointment and, though its members accept the Vatican decision, their remonstrances were sufficiently strong to indicate that exceptionally skillful handling will be needed if friction is to be avoided.

Political Difficulties There.

While no difficulties on the religious side have arisen or are likely to arise between the Free State Government and the ecclesiastical authorities, the political relations have not been so happy. The conception of the national government as something above parties who support or oppose its policy in the making is new in Ireland, and it is complained that some Bishops, in their eagerness to sit on the fence while Treatyites and anti-Treatyites are contending for supremacy, fail to bring this fact home to their flocks either by precept or example.

While in many ways it will be advantageous to Irish ministers to deal directly with the Vatican, it by no means follows that the Papal Envoy, thinking in terms of the Church as a whole, will see the situation either from their angle or that of the hierarchy. The appointment of the Nuncio is bound to have interesting ecclesiastical and political reactions and may prove to be the turning point in Free State history.

Hunting is in full swing in the Free State again and all the famous packs—the Killing Kildares, the Galway Blazers, the Ward Union and the Buhallows—are looking forward to a first-rate season. President Cosgrave is the only member of the executive council who rides constantly to the hounds, and so keen is he that he has been known to sandwich a run between two crossroads speeches in an election campaign; but all his colleagues value the Irish hunting economic asset.

It counts for quite as much as racing does in the development of the horse breeding industry and visitors who have tasted the thrill of a hot burst over double ranks in the Midlands or the more exciting joys of loose stone walls in Galway find hunting elsewhere rather like beer after champagne. Recently a member of the Dail declared the attraction of the Free State as a sporting centre would draw in a long run a sufficient number of wealthy Americans to compensate for the emigration drain.

Many Americans There.

Undoubtedly Americans have been coming lately in cars in large numbers since the stoppage of the English hunt as a result of an outbreak of foot and mouth disease, and they have discovered that Ireland possesses gamer foxes, stiffer fences and better horses while the absence of frost enables hunting to proceed in most counties without a break throughout the season. Unluckily there is one fly in the ointment. Wire is anathema to hunting men and Irish farmers in many hunting districts use wire much more extensively than in pre-war days for fencing. The hunts are doing their best to stop the practice, but most of them are too poor to offer inducements to the farmers to provide a substitute. Irish riders will continue to take chances, but until the wires are banished or cut down few outsiders will risk their necks in an area where any fence may prove their death trap.

Eamon de Valera, accompanied by his secretary, now is in the United States, where he hopes to redeem his promises of financial backing for his projected daily newspaper, made by Irish-Americans on the occasion of his last visit to America two years ago.

It was then announced that provided the Irish people subscribed $500,000 toward the enterprise shares of equivalent value would be taken up in America. It was arranged that payments for the Irish shares would be extended over two years, while American shareholders were to pay spot cash.

One Mission Here Failed.

The directors of the Irish Press, Ltd., as the new organization is called, announced last year that all the Irish shares had been taken up. On the strength of this Frank Aiken, chief whip of de Valera's party, was dispatched to the United States to collect the promised American funds some twelve months ago, but his mission did not prove fruitful and so Mr. de Valera, who had hoped his new paper would have been launched before this Christmas, now has found it necessary himself to cross the Atlantic.

For some time back this course has been strongly pressed upon the Republican leader by his fellow-directors, but he prudently bided his time until it became known that the Free State Government had completed arrangements to repay American holders of Dail Eireann bonds issued during the Black and Tan struggle in the name of the "Irish Republic." The prospects of attracting additional capital for ordinary Irish investors for the new Republican organ vanished as a result of the success of the Independent Newspapers, Ltd., whose recent issue of $1,000,000 worth of 7½ per cent preferred shares was oversubscribed in a few days.

There is growing belief here that instead of running a large morning paper the beginning may be with an evening journal issued in Dublin.

Legal Comment on Current Events

The Rule Against Impeaching One's Own Witness—Variation of Opinions in the Matter of Annulling Marriage Contracts.

Edited by Current Events Committee of American Association of Legal Authors.

Contradicting One's Own Witnesses.

During the trial of McManus the prosecution was frequently disappointed by the failure of witnesses to give expected testimony, or to testify before the trial jury in accordance with statements made on other occasions.

For example, the youthful cashier of Lindy's Restaurant testified before one grand jury that the voice over the telephone which requested that Rothstein be told that George McManus wanted to see him at the Park Central Hotel was not the voice of George McManus. Later he told another grand jury that the voice over the telephone had been recognized by him as that of McManus. On the witness stand at the McManus trial he reiterated his first statement that he did not recognize the voice over the telephone as that of McManus. Again, the Park Central Hotel chambermaid on the stand declined to identify McManus as having been one of two men seen in room 349. She had previously identified McManus as one of the men in room 349 in a "line-up" at the City Prison. While Judge Nott allowed the Assistant District Attorney to inquire briefly concerning these contradictions, extended interrogation was not allowed because of the rule which forbids to a party to litigation, whether a public prosecutor or other, the impeachment of his own witness or such contradiction as might indicate the witness to be unworthy of belief.

The rule against impeaching one's own witness had its source in the primitive modes of trial, according to Professor Wigmore, where persons who attended on behalf of the litigants were not witnesses, as now understood, but "oath helpers," claiming no knowledge of the facts, by whose mere oaths, taken by the prescribed number of persons, and in the proper form, the issue of the cause was determined. The doctrine which forbade the impeachment of one's own witness in the ancient days when witnesses were compurgators was absolute; but as applied to witnesses in the modern sense, presumably testifying to facts, it had its most conspicuous application, though not definitely its origin, in the impeachment trial of Warren Hastings in 1788, which aided to establish it as a rule of which there are many variants and from which many exceptions have been taken.

One Question Too Few.

It had been the theory of the prosecution in the McManus case that Rothstein was unarmed. That would exclude any possible theory of suicide. But Meehan had several times previously stated that in the washroom at Lindy's Restaurant, about an hour before Rothstein was shot, Rothstein took from his hip pocket and turned over to Meehan for safe-keeping a long-barreled .38-calibre revolver. On the witness stand Meehan testified that Rothstein had handed to him but one of two weapons which Rothstein was carrying on his person, Rothstein replacing in his coat pocket a short-barreled revolver of equal calibre with the long-barreled pistol turned over to Meehan.

When Meehan, under cross-examination, was somewhat impatiently interrogated by the Assistant District Attorney as to why he had not previously mentioned the short-barreled revolver which Rothstein had retained, he calmly replied, "You didn't ask me."

Witnesses are usually interrogated much more searchingly in preliminary investigations than when testifying before a trial jury, because too much persistence in cross-examination frequently brings out facts prejudicial to the inquisitor. But sometimes one question too few may be asked, as happened in a trial of which John Sharp Williams of Mississippi tells, occurring when he was counsel for a railway company, prior to his election to Congress. "At a grade crossing on its line the company had stationed an old negro watchman," related Mr. Williams, "whose duties consisted in warning pedestrians and drivers of vehicles, desiring to cross the tracks, of the approach of trains. One night a wagon belonging to a farmer was struck, resulting in a bad accident. The company was, of course, sued for damages, and at the trial the old darkey was the principal witness for his employers. He replied to the questions put to him by the railroad company's lawyer, and on cross-examination as well, in a clear, direct fashion. Among other things the old darkey was asked on cross-examination whether he was absolutely sure that he had swung his lantern across the road when he perceived the train's approach, to which the negro answered with emphasis: "I shorely did, sah."

The trial resulted in a verdict for the company, and Mr. Williams took early occasion to compliment the aged negro on his excellent testimony. The latter replied: "Thankee, Marse John, but I was shorely skeered when dat lawyer man begin to ask me about the lantern. I was afeared, for a minute, that he was goin' to ask me if it was lit or not. De oil done give out some time befo' de accident."

Representations of Previous Chastity.

Though many courts have said that the annulment of a marriage contract for fraud is governed by the same rules as other contracts, frequent deviations and inconsistencies are found. For example, the rule of many cases is that false representations as to previous chastity on the part of the woman are not sufficient for the annulment of a marriage because, as explained by the late New York Supreme Court Justice Jenks, in a case frequently cited, "such a representation is not as to the essentialia of the marriage contract." As opposing such a conclusion it has been inaptly argued that for breach of a warranty of soundness in the sale of a horse, or of fitness in the sale of merchandise, the contract will be canceled by law. Other cases, in New York and elsewhere, have adopted the rather broad principle that a marriage may be annulled if induced by any false representation without which, had it not been practiced, the party deceived would not have consented to the marriage. Such a rule, carried to its logical conclusion, would abandon the stricter requirement as to other contracts, that the misrepresentation must have been of a fact which, as a matter of law, is deemed material, sanctioning the dissolution of a marriage for any misstatement which a deceived party might say had induced the marriage, claiming that without the misrepresentation the marriage would not have occurred.

Some marriage annulment cases have actually extended the doctrine of misrepresentation of an existing fact to include misrerrestation of an existing intention. Thus, in a New York case, where the wife had entered into a civil ceremony of marriage, in reliance upon the husband's promise to have an orthodox Hebrew ceremony performed thereafter, it was held that the failure of the husband to carry out this plan indicated such a misrepresentation of an existing intention as would justify an annulment of the marriage, where there had been no cohabitation (197 App. Div. 489). But in Wisconsin it was preferably decided that where a Protestant, who, upon marrying a Catholic, agreed to have a second marriage ceremony performed in the Roman Catholic Church, thereafter refused to carry out such promise, there was not fraud of a character to authorize annulment of the marriage (180 Wisc. 654).

In the Di Lorenzo decision referred to above, the marriage was annulled because a woman, who had not given birth to a child at all, induced marriage upon the statement that she was the mother and the man the father of an infant borrowed for the imposture. In a later case (138 A. D. 454), in which the Di Lorenzo decision was cited as authority, a marriage was annulled where the woman, on inquiry of her intended husband, stated that she had been the wife of a man then deceased, who was the father of her child, when in truth she had been the mistress of the decedent and the child was illegitimate.

Legal Status of a "Spite" Marriage.

Dora Obermeister of Hoboken, N. J., recently became Mrs. Herman Shalefski, after a courtship so ardent and so brief that she admitted that at the time of the marriage she did not know how to pronounce her new name. Shortly after the ceremony the newly wedded husband discovered his bride gazing rapturously upon the photograph of a former flame. When questioned she admitted that she had married Shalefski solely in order to spite the man she really loved. The husband thereupon tried to wrest from her finger her new wedding ring, to accomplish which he twisted his bride's arm. The next scene was laid in a magistrate's court, where the charge of disorderly conduct against the husband was dismissed, with the admonition not to molest his "spite" bride again.

No police magistrate has jurisdiction to dissolve a marriage, though such courts have power to punish a husband or wife for violence inflicted upon the other. Nor would the fact that a young woman had promised to love, honor and cherish the man she married entitle him to a dissolution of the union merely because the wife at the time of the marriage did not love the husband, but loved some one else, who did not reciprocate her affection. Of course, marriages have been dissolved in many cases on the ground of fraud practiced by one of the parties upon the other, but the general rule of law is that the fraud must go to the essence, as it is expressed, of the marriage contract. This because, as Judge John C. Gray once said, "marriage contracts are based upon considerations peculiar to themselves, and public policy is concerned with the regulation of the family relation." Misrepresentations as to fortune, character or social standing, for example, are not as a rule sufficient for annulment (333 Ill. 478), and however it may be from a romantic point of view, the law takes a practical view of matrimony and does not regard love as of the essence of the arrangement. To quote a Missouri court, the law "ignores the sentimental idea that 'marriages are made in heaven' and takes cognizance of the reality that the inducements of wedlock are mostly of a terrestrial nature" (137 S. W. 1014).

ASSERTS POWERS SAW BORIS ON REPARATIONS

Sofia Newspaper Says Envoys Went Over Head of Bulgarian Government.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SOFIA, Dec. 5.—That representatives of Great Britain, France and Italy had taken the slightly unusual step of going over the heads of the Bulgarian Government to King Boris himself in the question of Bulgarian reparations was declared by the newspaper Zname to be the explanation of the successive and self-sought audiences with the King which the Ministers of the great powers mentioned they had had in the last few days.

Since the Paris conference on Eastern reparations fixed Bulgarian reparations payments at an annual average of 2,500,000 gold francs ($482,500) nothing has been heard from the Bulgarian Government in the way of either acceptance or refusal. And although the French, British and Italian Ministers at Belgrade recently presented a note to the effect that the reparations question must be settled by Dec. 15, Bulgaria has given no intimation that she was ready to negotiate, but has given many riotous manifestations of her unwillingness to pay.

The action of the "great lovers" now in "appearing to Caesar" is accepted as highly significant of the obstinate attitude of the Bulgarian Government toward the proposal that the country's reparations be fixed at a relatively high figure. A fortnight ago M. Chéron, French Commissioner for the League of Nations in Bulgaria, sequestrated $3,000,000 income of the Bulgarian State Railways because the Ministry refused to heed his demand that the system be reorganized. To this the reply of the Minister of Railways is said to have been to offer his resignation to King Boris.

Turkey to Standardize Weights.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Nov. 12.—Standardization of weights and measures is a reform outlined this year by the Minister of National Economy. Considerable inconvenience has been experienced through use of the old Turkish units, such as the oke. Recently a circular letter was sent to all cereal workers inviting employes to acquaint themselves with the more modern system. A law will be introduced in the National Assembly governing this.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

JAPANESE MEET CHINESE IN DEBATE

Thresh Out Some of Their Differences at Conference on Pacific Relations at Kyoto.

BUT NOTHING IS ACHIEVED

Good-Will Atmosphere Is Zealously Maintained by Foreign Delegates—Many Problems Discussed.

By HUGH BYAS.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

TOKIO, Nov. 23.—The third biennial Conference on Pacific Relations, which has been in session at Kyoto for ten days, is likely, in the opinion of many delegates, to mark a stage in the development of this interesting attempt to create an informed public opinion on Pacific and Far Eastern questions.

Two possibilities have been open: one, that the conference might become a mixture of glad-hand convention and political debating society—say, at best a Pacific Williamstown; the other, that if it were attended by the right people it would develop into a clearing house of authentic information and so become a real directing force of public opinion regarding Pacific questions. It is not quite settled which way the conference will take—this was but its third meeting—but though the Kyoto gathering opened with a considerable effluxion of platitudes, it got down to actual facts and reasonable arguments before the end.

To a large extent, Kyoto was an arena in which Japanese and Chinese fought out some of their differences, the foreign delegates forming the ring and anxiously promoting good-will. The Japanese, however, were hosts as well as gladiators, and it is agreed that as hosts they preserved an attitude of courtesy, moderation and candor in acute discussion and sometimes under some provocation. But the Chinese were courteous guests. They were deeply concerned about their country and very conscious of its sufferings. At first they took some latitude in their charges. But the "ring" was not impressed by generalities, and they quickly realized that reasonable argument and moderate statement were better than general invective. They had two audiences to think it—the calm and critical audience before them and the more excitable audience in China.

The Japanese did not forget those difficulties. It is probable that the Japanese and Chinese understood each other better fundamentally than any of the Western delegations understood them. At all events, they were meeting together in private conclave at the end, and some progress toward a better mutual understanding had been made.

Subjects of Discussion.

The discussions at the various round tables and the open forums of the institute were arranged under the main headings of "Industrialization," "Extraterritoriality in China," "Concessions and Settlements in China," "Manchuria," "Finances of China" and "Diplomatic Relations of China," with numerous subheads and minor excursions into other matters.

The discussions on industrialization, ramifying into such questions as the influence of the machine age on art and culture, and problems of population and food supply might have been undertaken anywhere as well as at Kyoto. There could be little point in discussing whether the nations on this side of the Pacific should reject Western science, mechanization and a dynamic civilization when the East has already decided that it wants these things and intends to have them. Those interesting if somewhat academic inquiries broke the ice and led the conference to the discussions on China, on which its real interest was concentrated.

A lead on the question of immigration which Viscount Shibusawa offered in the opening address, which was read in his behalf, was not followed up, and no further reference was made to the subject. The venerable Viscount is one of those pro-American Japanese whose feelings were deeply hurt by the immigration law, and at his age of 89 fixed ideas are apt to assert themselves. The conference did not discuss the question because (a) there have been no developments since it was debated at Honolulu two yeas ago, and (b) no one has thought of a practical amendment to the law.

The suggestion that a Japanese quota, numbering about 150 annually, should be admitted breaks down because no one has yet devised a formula which would admit this negligible number of Japanese without at the same time opening the door to a much larger quota of Chinese.

The discussions of Manchuria raised the question of Sino-Japanese relations in its sharpest aspect and gave the conference its most animated debates. The outstanding feature was Mr. Yosuke Matsuoka's defense of Japanese policy. His statement, courteous in manner and made convincing by a clear understanding of the facts, made a great impression on the delegates.

In these discussions the Japanese stated the well-known reasons for their special position in Manchuria: the war with Russia to prevent the absorption of Manchuria by that country; the subsequent necessity for precautions against a renewal of Russian pressure; protection from disorder of Japanese subjects and the rights and interests they developed after the Russian war. It was obvious that China had at no time been able to protect Manchuria against foreign aggression or internal disorder, and Japan's presence in Manchuria was due to necessity. The Japanese were also able to show that their connection with Manchuria had promoted the welfare of the Chinese inhabitants, who had flocked thither in hundreds of thousands in search of the peace and security which their own government was unable to give them.

Chinese Spokesmen's Arguments.

The Chinese spokesmen argued that Manchuria's peace was due to geographical remoteness from the civil war, and that the growth of trade and population was part of the general progress of China proper. But the statistics on which the Chinese relied for that last statement included those for Manchuria, and the Japanese had no difficulty in proving that in Manchuria progress had been on an altogether different scale from anything in China.

Something of practical value emerged from the discussion on the presence of the Japanese troops and police. The Chinese produced evidence of harsh incidents, and the Japanese, while stating that their accounts would in many cases differ from the Chinese, admitted the difficulty of controlling subordinate officials in their dealings with alien communities, and proposals were made by the Japanese for better methods of promptly investigating and, if possible, preventing such incidents.

Chinese fear of aggressive intentions on the part of Japan were in evidence. A Japanese delegate suggested that the two nations might conclude a non-aggression and inviolability pact in order to allay those Chinese fears and at the same time give Japan some security that her rights would not be terminated by abrogation of the treaties and agreements.

No measure proposed received entire mutual assent, but the discussions were conducted with moderation and courtesy. The discussions certainly cleared the air, and the Chinese and Japanese representatives, who at the beginning were very distrustful of each other, were at the end inclined to draw together outside of the regular sessions for private exploration of their differences.

Extraterritoriality came next to Manchuria in the interest it aroused. Dr. James Shotwell made a noteworthy contribution to the question in a detailed plan which he submitted. It proposed the immediate abolition of extraterritoriality, but China was to place the courts at half a dozen ports where foreign interests are concentrated under judges chosen from an international panel nominated by the World Court. The Chinese delegates admitted it was a reasonable as well as an ingenious plan, but they did not discuss it.

The practical question simply is whether the Chinese, after the agitation which has been conducted, will tolerate any foreign judges. The Chinese delegates were able to announce that modern codes of law, dealing with all the essential subjects, had been promulgated and were in effect. They admitted that political rights had not been fully secured under the present régime, but it was claimed that civil rights were recognized and that they were protected in the enjoyment of them, and they argued that foreigners were concerned with civil rights only.

The difficulty, of course, is that to which the American and British Governments referred in their replies to the Chinese note on the subject. The printing of a code is but a first step; can the person whose liberty or property is at stake depend that that code will be administered?

Case Cited as Example.

A case was cited in which a direct order had been sent by the executive government at Nanking to the court at Shanghai to take possession of the property of a Chinese resident of the International Settlement. The Chinese admitted that their civil rights were sometimes infringed when the persons concerned had been engaged in political or military activities. A very mild statement was made on behalf of American and other business men in China to the effect that they would not care to live under the conditions in regard to taxation which the Chinese endure; but the Chinese delegates made detailed discussion unnecessary by their frank admission that conditions are not what they should be nor what the Nationalist Government hopes to make them.

In this atmosphere the foreign delegates did not press the damaging implications of the admission that Chinese civil rights received no adequate protection from the code or the courts when the executive thought fit to disregard them. Both Chinese and foreigners were disposed to avoid plunging into logical blind alleys, and some credit is due to past conferences for this moderation. But the 1929 conference registered no advance on 1927. The recommendations of the Extraterritoriality Commission for modification of the existing practice, as a step to complete abolition, were hardly discussed, and the Chinese delegates gave little indication of readiness to consider such modifications as temporary measures. There is still no sign of common ground on this difficult question.

The conference got an opportunuity to touch one of the most acute questions of the day when the quarrel between Russia and China came up under the head of diplomatic relations in the Pacific region. The result was disappointing. As Russia's representative was only an observer who did not care to speak, no discussion of the merits of the case was possible, and delegates mainly contented themselves with speculations as to how and by what agencies settlement might be sought. Mr. Stimson's action in reminding the disputants of their obligations under the Kellogg pact was approved, but general haziness prevailed as to the next step needed, and the absence of provisions for implementing the Pact of Paris was felt.

Various proposals were made for commissions of inquiry to determine the facts, but as neither side had asked for an inquiry, as no authority could be clearly designated to appoint the commission, and as Russia made restoration of the status quo ante a prerequisite of any negotiations, those proposals could not get very far. The absence of Russian delegates prevented the operation of one of the principal functions of the conference—the promotion of friendly approach between representatives of States at loggerheads—and it cannot be said that the session contributed anything to the improvement of Sino-Russian relations.

The conference can only deal with international relations, and 95 per cent of the issues before it were inextricably interwoven with the internal condition of China. The delegates were reluctant to make statements which would wound the sensibilities of their Chinese colleagues, and while this attitude made for harmony, it also shed an air of artificiality over some of the speeches.

It would have been rude to suggest that China is passing through another of those periodical cataclysms of which her history records many and which have lasted not for decades but for generations and even centuries. Politeness required a tacit acceptance of the Nationalist thesis that the period of turmoil is all but over; that despite passing unpleasantness, China is to have a unitary government henceforth, and that the problem is simply one of getting over the transition stage.

Hard Financial Realities.

The short discussion on finance, however, brought the conference up against hard realities. The Chinese opening statement expressed confidence that the current budget could be balanced, but admitted that for the establishment of a stable and efficient government foreign loans are necessary. This led to the question of what security could be offered, and the deplorable state of China's internal affairs was made evident.

No one could suggest any acceptable security. Things are worse than they were a few years ago, when the consortium was willing to make a loan for a public utility and accept the utility as security. That project fell through because the Chinese were unwilling to submit to supervision of the expenditure in order to insure that the funds should be applied to the purpose for which they had been loaned. Chinese aversion to supervision still exists, and there has been added to that drawback the inability of Chinese Governments to inspire confidence in their ability to protect any public utility from the militarists.

A significant statement was made in regard to the finances of India, a country comparable with China in its poverty, the vastness of its illiterate population and its struggle to assimilate Western civilization. India's public debt is larger than that of China, but most of it is invested in productive undertakings which earn a profit. The Indian budgets, both provincial and central, are public, and every Indian knows what is done with the country's money. In China no one can tell what a bolt of cotton cloth will pay in taxation between the port at which it is landed and the up-country store where it will be retailed.

The foreign delegates were ready to help in the financial rehabilitation of China, but their Chinese colleagues could advance no proposition, suggest no security. It is not an exaggeration to say of this part of the conference that the Chinese had nothing to say except that they needed money.

The main business of the conference has now been sketched. It is not easy to say what it accomplished. Considered with philosophic detachment, it was really a curious spectacle. Here were members of the intelligentsia from the ends of the earth—teachers, philosophers, divines, statesmen, business men, journalists, uplifters and tourists—assembled round an arena in which Chinese and Japanese fought with the weapons of debate. A curious but surely not a useless spectacle. The fact that Japanese and Chinese were willing to argue out their differences before this remarkable jury is a sign of changing times.

The British and Japanese and Americans sent strong delegations, but it was difficult to know just what the Chinese delegation represented. Their leader, Dr. David Yui, an able man and most attractive personality, is general secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in China. Only one member of the Kuomintang party was present. The conference felt that it could not discuss the condition of the Chinese people. Their cruel exploitation by military leaders; the destructive interference with transportation; the means used for extorting money from those who have it, and the disregard of what the Occident considers as common rights, such as judicial procedure, in the punishment of offenders against the existing régime, did not, even behind closed doors, receive the ventilation of discussion.

The scantiest allusion was made to the civil war now proceeding. No suggestion came from the conference as to how China might set her house in order, or as to methods by which foreign assistance might be given her in this task. She was advised to disband her armies, but no account was taken of her inability to act on this good advice while her military leaders are competing for control. No doubt Chiang would be glad to disband Feng's hosts, and vice versa, but who will disband in the name of the suffering and exploited Chinese people?

The difficulties of dealing frankly at an international gathering with such delicate subjects as China's condition are obvious, but at the close many delegates were convinced that the future of the gathering depends on its ability to deal with facts. The conference has a great function to perform as a clearing house for the West of information on questions of the Far East, and an organ by which the moral and intellectual aid of the West can be extended to the communities of the Far East. With strong delegations, limited in numbers, and conferences able to talk facts this gathering would be a valuable organ in the evolution of Eastern democracies and the creation of a safe Western public opinion.

GERMAN LABOR GETS USED TO CONVEYOR

Factory Workers No Longer Oppose Big Plants' Rationalization of Production.

Workers in German factories are becoming accustomed to the belt-conveyor system now in use in many large plants and have practically abandoned their early opposition to this feature of the rationalization of production, judging from an article recently published in the weekly magazine of the German Federation of Metal Workers and summarized as follows by the Geneva Bureau of the International Labor Organization of the League of Nations:

"When work with belt conveyors was first introduced in Europe this new method was received with very mixed feelings. In Germany in particular the workers were very skeptical. Not only the workers but also recognized authorities of such high standing as Werner Sombart spoke of the human factor in work being killed off. It must be clear, however, to an attentive observer that there has been a considerable change in the attitude to the work with conveyors. In many cases those employed on this work have quite settled down to it and do not wish to change back. In the United States the opposition to work with conveyors was never particularly strong.

"The RWK-Nachrichten, published by the Reich Management Institute, contains a report on rationalization in the boot and shoe industry, which states that the great majority of workers, male or female, find it perfectly simple to adapt themselves to individual work with belt conveyors. Even in undertakings where this type of work does not, as in most cases, involve an increase of from 5 to 10 per cent in earnings, as compared with individual piece work, the workers are keen to use conveyors. There are a few workers who voluntarily abandon this type of work because they cannot become accustomed to the fixed rhythm of the work, while a few women workers complain that their eyes find the constant movement of the belt a disturbing factor. None, however, give up the work because of its undue uniformity. Similar observations may be made in other industries.

"The belt conveyor exercises a mysterious attraction over the workers. The personality of the human worker is cut out, and yet the workers become accustomed to it. It may not always be voluntary, but frequently under compulsion, because they will lose their means of subsistence if they cannot follow the rhythm of the iron chain. It would be well if the trade unions were to undertake an inquiry into the effects of work with conveyors in various industries, with a view to discovering whether there is a general impression that the workers are in favor of work with conveyors and no longer wish that they should be abolished."

THE FAR EAST ENTERS A NEW ERA

A German Writer's Comprehensive Study of the Nationalist Movement

Kamakura.

A HISTORY OF NATIONALISM IN THE EAST. By Hans Kohn. Introduction, Bibliography and Index. 15 Maps. 476 pp. New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co. $5.

By GARDNER HARDING

AFTER the most comprehensive survey of the history of nationalism in the East that has been attempted by a modern author, Hans Kohn falls back on something like the essence of skepticism, as expressed by the English historian, Arnold Toynbee, in these words of disillusionment:

> The historian is led to speculate whether the inoculation of the East with nationalism has not from the beginning brought in diminishing returns in happiness and prosperity. Given the previous breakdown of indigenous institutions and the irresistible ascendency of the West, he must admit that it was inevitable. But he will possibly judge the movement to have been not so much a political advance as a necessary evil.

Thus speaks the historian who also reckons life in terms of sociology. But the defenders of nationalism will answer, as Mr. Kohn does by implication many times, that they do not pretend to add to the comfort, the material well-being, or even the security of a single human individual. Nationalism, as China for the Chinese, India for the Indians or Arabia for the Arabians, comports, they say, with a fundamental dignity of the spirit; it encourages not the privilege to be prosperous but the right to be free. The surest cure for believing in nationalism as a goal is its realization, however, and throughout the East the new racial consciousness which makes leaders of orators, students, politicians and holy men and shuts the whole science of economics out of its conception of progress is none the less a necessary evil for being glorified as a heroic adventure.

The social connotations of these nationalist movements, which extend now from across Northern Africa to the furthermost East of Asia, are fully spread forth in this ample and conscientious volume. The ablest treatment is that of the Mohammedan countries, especially Arabia, Turkey and Persia. Indian nationalism, as set in the scheme of the British Empire, is admirably synthesized in a dispassionate and elaborate account which pays particular attention to its important, British-inspired origins in the middle of the eighteenth century. Russia, Japan and China are treated as fully, though without quite the same wealth of illuminating detail. The conspectus of the author is world-wide, whatever phase of Asiatic nationalism he is treating, and it is not unworthy of note that a considerable part of this book was penned during a long period of the author's work and study at Jerusalem.

"It is precisely the historic process now unfolding in the East," the author declares, "that is tending more and more to unite mankind as a whole." The general structure of his book is built on the conception that the world is today divided into three main dominant spheres of influence, acting and reacting upon one another in what is at present a fairly constant equipoise. The English-speaking world, Britain, the United States and the British Commonwealth of Nations, which has succeeded to the domain of the British Empire, he places as the strongest nexus; the powers of Continental Europe, in spite of the deep-riven divisions of the late war, he considers as bound more and more to act together from now on as the next strongest expression of common power. In the common destiny of Asia, which he profoundly feels and expresses with virtually an Oriental imagination, he sees the third great division of the world's repository power. Between the claims of Europe and those of Asia Russia still irresolutely hesitates, ready to throw in its lot with Asia if and when it becomes apparent that Europe cannot be induced to join her own Ishmaelite position toward political and economic normalcy.

The author is most at home in contemplating and expatiating on the disruptive idealism that is impelled by practically all the nationalist movements in Asia. If the trends are in opposite directions, he leaves them perforce to reconcile themselves. Russia, especially, never so nationalist as in these days when she rests on a basis of nationalism abrogated and denied, is diligently leading Asia wherever she can toward further expressions of nationalism she abhors in herself and in her compeers of passé Europe and America. Only the "necessary evil" theory can save the general shape of this argument from a reductio ad absurdum, but the author is profound enough to anticipate this in the beginning, and modest enough to appeal to it again in broaching his concluding chapter to the reader who has followed him so far and so deviously.

It is in the early chapters on the currents of thought and history of the Mohammedan world that the book has most of the quality of breadth and pertinency which the author designs for it. Out of the Mohammedan religion Eastern racial pride has been accentuated and nationalist movements encouraged by two distinct groups of movements which have powerfully stimulated Christendom as well as Islam. These are, on the one hand, the Bahai faith, which has modernized the Shi'ite schism of Persia into an international cause of peace and brotherhood and the Ahma- (Continued on Page 43)

American and British Technique In the Short Story

Two Annual Anthologies Which Provide a Basis for Comparison of Methods and Approach

THE BEST SHORT STORIES OF 1929. Edited by Edward J. O'Brien. 380 pp. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.50.

THE BEST BRITISH SHORT STORIES OF 1929. Edited By Edward J. O'Brien, Publisher, and price same.

TAKING these two anthologies together, the one of American stories and the other of British, one is not so much conscious of a disparity in merit as of a difference in kind. It is a widely accepted truism that America, in spite of the influence of the commercial magazine, has brought a first-hand sense of life to its stories and conveyed it in new and individual forms which have rescued the short-story from a wasteland of convention and tradition; whereas England has gone on writing tales in the accepted, unaltered manner. And this is largely true. But it is not necessarily true, though it is a no less widely accepted truism, that the contemporary short-story in America is vastly superior to the contemporary short-story in England. For the merit of a short-story's intentions and the merit of the finished work are not a matter of cause and effect.

Reading these two books one finds, indeed, about the same number of good stories, of mediocre stories and of bad stories in each—one even finds a single story in each that stands out head and shoulders above the rest. There is no appreciable difference in merit; but there are striking differences in origins and intentions, in themes and techniques.

As we look at the short-story in America for the past twenty years we recognize certain definite (and successive) influences which have shaped its growth. We see O. Henry ousted (in all stories of any significance) by Sherwood Anderson and a whole school that derives vaguely from the Russians which stands for autochthonous simplicity; we see, on the heels of "Main Street," a whole school, of which Ruth Suckow is a successful figure, writing photographically or satirically of bourgeois or small mid-Western life; we see Hemingway displacing his predecessors with a new and authoritative formula; just now (though there is little sign of it in Mr. O'Brien's own anthology) we see a new school arising to wipe out this whole succession of influences in favor of a hesitant but serious sophistication—not Mr. Van Vechten's or transition's or the epicene decadence of the '90s, but something based on continental culture adjusted to the American scene.

In terms of art, in terms of the future, in terms of national growth, these tendencies which have sometimes borne fruit and sometimes proved only to be ignes fatui, have a meaning and praiseworthiness of intention which all of us must acknowledge. In England, on the other hand, there has been far less experimental short-story writing. Why, then, has Mr. O'Brien's anthology of American stories no more merit than his British anthology, composed as it is almost entirely of stories in the traditional manner? Is it, as it so obviously might be, because experimentation makes for imperfection and error while traditionalism makes for assurance and success? This may be part of the reason, but something else is more important. The British keep pace with the Americans by possessing a single strong point on which we are weak.

This strength is the strength of the British tradition itself—not its tradition in fiction or the short story so much as in poetry. That quality of imagination which has created the noblest of all treasuries of poetry still functions there, not notably or impressively, but to a far greater degree than it functions in America. There is a poetic sense of terror or vividness or, in diluted form, of beauty about some of these stories which comprises an achievement equal to the ingenuity of form, the reality of sentiment, the photographic cleverness of background that one finds in the American stories.

In the present volumes a very decent average is maintained—at least half the stories in each anthology are worth reading. (Which prompts the gratuitous suggestion that Mr. O'Brien might more wisely, if less profitably, issue his anthologies once every two years). Miss Cather is represented with "Double Birthday," the admirably warm and sentimental tone of which harmonizes with warm and sentimental material. Sherwood Anderson's "The Lost Novel" might be termed a noble failure—but though a failure, it is the authentic Anderson the imitators cannot match. L. A. G. Strong has a short and tender tale; Martin Armstrong has something which might have been a masterpiece of terror and evil had not its fictitious narrator spoiled everything with his garrulity and lamentable eloquence. Konrad Bercovici, Stella Benson, Edward McKenna, to name but three names, have stories that are pleasant and passingly interesting. There are the usual genre stories of peasants and negroes and the Irish, and there are the usual stories which meant nothing in magazine form and mean still less now.

"Landor's Cottage."

From One of the Drawings by Harry Clarke for "Tales of Mystery and Imagination," by Edgar Allen Poe. (Brentano.)

And there are two stories of real merit: Glenway Westcott's "A Guilty Woman," human and true, with genuine moral and psychological implications and with genuine power to the story telling, is one; the other, and to our mind better, tale is David Garnett's "A Russian Story." Told with that impersonality which represents, not the twentieth but the early eighteenth century, this story of a handsome young Russian forester who is doomed by heart disease, is moving and awful by reason of its surface heartlessness. It is a story hard to analyze; a story of which one can only say that it opens up the imagination and stirs the heart, coming to one with the force of a parable, a parable of the worm always at the heart of the rose, of the tragic fact that there is no human perfection.

Range and Depth in Thomas Mann's Essays

THREE ESSAYS. By Thomas Mann. Translated from the German by H. T. Lowe-Porter. 261 pp. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

By LOUIS KRONENBERGER

NO two events could be more in harmony than the award of the Nobel Prize to Thomas Mann at the moment that these essays are for the first time published in English. On the basis of his novels and stories Mann had, of course, an excellent claim to the prize; but on the added basis of these essays the claim becomes even greater. It is not often that a book like this, whose only unity is the profound mind and sturdy philosophy of the author, gets published in any generation—a book impregnated with wide humanism and culture, with powerful thought, enduring criticism and forceful personality. The classic German tradition is upheld here, as in the best of Mann's fiction, by the artist to whom it has proved most nourishing in our generation. It is upheld and, in a sense, examined; the humanism which Goethe fostered inquires now of Goethe; the inheritor of Frederick the Great looks back upon his enigmatic ancestor; the classic tradition of philosophy and reason applies its achievement to the modern-day problem of the occult.

These three subjects which have nothing specific in common with one another, which in their very dissimilarity reveal the reach and fullness of Mann's mind, are the subjects of his book. The first and by far the longest of the three essays, "Goethe and Tolstoy," is by far the most important. It is not an essay of limited literary interests; it is far more even than an investigation of two supreme artists in their relation to life or to each other. For Mann has bracketed these names not to contrast them, but to represent them as giants similar in type, the real contrasts with whom are Schiller and Dostoevsky. For Mann insists that even though "the one was a European humanist and thorough-paced pagan, while the other was an anarchist and a primitive Oriental Christian to boot," Goethe and Tolstoy are united by a fundamental and irreducible affinity, as are Schiller and Dostoevsky—an affinity which constitutes the whole working basis of the essay. Goethe and Tolstoy were children of Nature, Dostoevsky and Schiller children of spirit.

This is the heart of the matter, the dominant, recurrent, integrating theme which is sounded in one variation after another. Nature against spirit becomes God against saint, health against disease, classicism against romanticism, body against soul, nationalism against cosmopolitanism; and, might not Mann have added, egotism against humility? On the side of Nature Mann shows how, in the final sense, a man like Tolstoy worked in the dark, drawing only on his own powers. In his later period he fought, of course, against his inheritance; but beneath the veneer of democrat and Christian lurked—indeed, was fully revealed—the aristocrat and the barbarian. Mann quotes from Aksakov that singularly fitting description of Tolstoy's work was "bearlike," and says himself, significantly: "The Tolstoyan greatness and remoteness is wild and primeval and pagan in its nature, it is antecedent to culture." Goethe, of course, with his culture and his skepticism, was in a different boat, but pushing through to the core of the man, Mann questions whether even his humanism was not merely "conventional," and he himself the "ethnic divinity" who, Anteus-like, refreshed his powers from the earth he trod.

The contrast of nature with spirit, the aspiration of each to attain the other (not merely to understand it, for in appreciation the children of spirit are immeasurably quicker—witness Dostoevsky's unreciprocated appreciation of Tolstoy, or Schiller's badly reciprocated appreciation of Goethe) calls insistently, on Mann's part, for evaluation of the two "aristocracies." But Mann refuses to pass a final judgment on their relative merits.

Beautiful is resolution, he says. But the really fruitful, the productive, and hence the artistic principle is that which we call reserve. * * * In the intellectual sphere we love it [reserve] as irony; that irony which glances at both sides, which * * * is in no great haste to come to decisions. * * * In the foregoing pages I have tried it, this "infinite" irony; and my readers may judge upon which extreme it more enjoyed playing * * * and draw their conclusions accordingly.

This problem which he leaves for us would be easier to solve were it not concerned with supreme artists. In ordinary human life Mann's protest, however humanistic and skeptical the man himself, is against disease and decadence, overrichness of "spirit." His Hanno Buddenbrooks, his Gustav von Aschenfeld of "Death in Venice" are indictments of the romantic, the cosmopolitan impulse. Furthermore, Mann, who has confessed himself to be a "bourgeois strayed into art," has imbibed a tradition we must associate with Goethe as away from the poetic idealism of Schiller. But this very identity of temperament gives Mann a deeper insight into the limitations and contradictions of the children of nature than he might otherwise have and makes Mann himself a victim of that "aspiration of the children of nature toward spirit" which he defines as the subject of his essay. But beyond this his culture and temperament, however indebted to tradition, are of our century and not another, and look back, in a world of greater complexity, with double vision. Here the critic if not the moralist in him has fused nature with spirit and risen in mind if not in temperament above the eternal conflict. Wherever his instincts may be, and one hazards the guess that they lie with, at least, Goethe, his mind is ubiquitous and free.

The essay called "An Experience in the Occult" (which links up with a chapter of similar theme in "The Magic Mountain") tells of a seance Mann attended where, without possibility of fraud, things happened—arms and hands, for example, materialized out of nothing visible—where "reason commands us to recognize what reason on the other hand would reject as impossible." Forced to believe, Mann pursued the matter to find this "scientific" explanation:

> A fluid, in varying degrees of density, leaves the body of the medium as an amorphous, unorganized mass; takes form in various teleplastic organs; and after existence in this form * * * dissolves and is reabsorbed into the medial organism. And this fluid * * * is uniform, undifferentiated; there is no such thing as a bone-substance as different from a muscular one; there is only the one substance, the basis and substratum of organic life.

The essay is easily the best told, the most vivid, the most exciting and provocative and sane account

Martin Van Buren, the "Red Fox" of the Jackson Era

Mr. Lynch Writes an Appreciative Biography of the Man Who Refused to Shift on the Slavery Question

AN EPOCH AND A MAN: Martin Van Buren and His Times. By Denis Tilden Lynch. New York: Horace Liveright. 566 pp. $5.

By CHARLES WILLIS THOMPSON

MR. LYNCH has done justice to one of the misunderstood figures of American history; although there is a persistency about Martin Van Buren that nullifies much of the misunderstanding. He is still spoken of slightingly as a mere sly politician, but nothing can prevent him from obtruding, while the mere sly politicians have all gone to their deserved silences. It does not take long for a mere politician to become a mere name in history. McKinley, after twenty-eight years, is a great deal deader than Van Buren after eighty or a hundred, whichever you prefer as his historic date. Pierce is a name; Polk, who defeated Van Buren because Van Buren was too brave and outspoken to be a trimmer, is a painting. But Van Buren is much more alive today than he was in 1862, the last year of his life.

He got the name of the "Red Fox" because no power could make him take a position on any question until he had deliberated over it to the last possible minute. While everybody was talking, he was silent. But his enemies preferred not to observe that once he did make up his mind on any question, nothing could ever shake him, or that he would fight for the position he had taken in utter disregard of the effect on his own fortunes, and fight to the death. To so extreme a point did he carry this characteristic of his that he, the greatest figure in the Democratic party, bolted from it on the slavery question, caused its defeat and thereby ended his own career.

This bolt of his was in 1848; but he had already, in 1844, sacrificed a sure nomination for the Presidency by obstinately flaunting his own views on that same slavery question. When he bolted in 1848 he ran independently for President as the head of a new party of his own, which was called the Free Soil party. Six years later this organization had evolved into the Republican party; so it is no exaggeration to call Martin Van Buren, the fifth Democratic President, the real founder of Republicanism.

He himself, however, never ceased to be a Democrat, just as Theodore Roosevelt, who led a similar bolt from the Republican party in 1912, never ceased to be a Republican. It was Van Buren's aim to force the Democratic party into taking the right position on the slavery question, and the slogan of his bolting party was "Free Soil, Free Speech, Free Labor and Free Men." It was to achieve this end that he formed what may be called the Bull Moose party of 1848.

This bolt of his is worth a great deal of attention because it illustrates his character. It was the outcome of a long fight, during which the Mexican War had divided the Democratic party into slavery and anti-slavery wings, and Democrats in Congress were infuriating the South by fighting for the Wilmot Proviso, which was presented by a Democratic Representative. But, long before the issue had thus become national, Van Buren himself had made it, fought for it, and lost the Presidency by enraging the South.

That had happened at a time when the slavery question was not at all national, and Van Buren knew he was taking the unpopular side. In 1844 the slave power aimed to annex Texas so as to add another slave State to the Union, and possibly more than one, if Texas could split into several States. The popular thing for a politician to do was either to favor the annexation or to straddle. Everybody was doing it.

Van Buren, the leading figure, even the dominant figure, in his party, was certain to get the nomination. But he came out with a denunciation of the new move of the slave power, stuck to his guns, and lost it. The nomination went to a dark horse, James Knox Polk, who, of course, hailed from a Southern State. Then came the annexation, the Mexican War, the Wilmot Proviso, Van Buren's bolt, and that split in the Democratic party which was to last through the Civil War.

The mildness, courtesy and restraint of Van Buren's manners, his precision and refusal to exaggerate or even use the usual emphasis of the politician, contributed powerfully to the creation of the false portrait of the "Red Fox." A campaign song of 1840, scoring this imaginary double-dealer, inquired:

How can one tell by the looks of his track
Whether he's going or just coming back?

And it is true that the real Van Buren kept his opinions to himself as long as he could, and when finally he expressed them, did so with a moderation entirely out of style among politicians, especially politicians of the Jackson days. But once he had made up his mind, he was an Indian on the trail.

Van Buren was the general of Jackson's war with Calhoun and the Cabinet over Peggy O'Neal, a war which disrupted the administration. One incident of that war will give an idea of the strength of the hand within the velvet glove. Mrs. Donelson, the President's niece, who presided over the White House, sided with the Calhoun crowd; and Van Buren in that mild, unruffled manner of his, and with his great courtesy of language, gently explained to her that she owed a duty to her uncle which she must fulfill. In his autobiography he says:

> I arose from my seat begging her to excuse whatever I might, under the excitement of the moment, have said to hurt her feelings * * * and I asked her permission to drop the subject.

But what he had so kindly said was so uncompromising that she was, as he puts it with his usual moderation, "deeply agitated and also offended"; and her cousin had withdrawn into a window embrasure and was crying. What he had said may be judged from the fact that Mrs. Donelson and her husband were unceremoniously packed off to Tennessee; and this was one incident only of the war in which Van Buren was the general. That velvet manner of his concealed dynamite.

When the Peggy O'Neal war had brought the administration to the point of disaster, Van Buren settled it by announcing to Jackson that he intended to resign as Secretary of State. Old Hickory protested violently, but the gentle Van Buren was immovable. He knew that his resignation would force the rest of the Cabinet to resign and give Jackson a chance to form a new Ministry with dignity and with the upper hand. He announced his decision to the two loyal members of the Cabinet, Postmaster General Barry and Peggy's husband, Secretary of War Eaton, and to Jackson's right-hand man, Major Lewis. As the group walked along toward Van Buren's house to dine, Eaton suddenly stopped and burst out:

> "Gentlemen, this is all wrong. Here we have a Cabinet so remarkable that it has required all the General's force of character to carry it along—there is but one man in it who is entirely fit for his place, and we are about consenting that he should leave it!"

The truth of this blunt ejaculation was such that everybody roared. But Van Buren had his way, in spite of the terrible Jackson; his resignation forced that of the whole Cabinet except Barry, and the President was enabled to go ahead with his policies without having his steps halted at every move by this irrelevant imbroglio. Incidentally, Calhoun had suffered one of the severest defeats of his life, and his vindictive plot was exploded.

One of Van Buren's nicknames was "the great magician." In commenting on the crash of the Calhoun conspiracy, the famous editor, Mordecai P. Noah, wrote: "Well, indeed, may Mr. Van Buren be called the great magician, for he raises his wand and the whole Cabinet vanishes."

One of the subjects on which Van Buren did make up his mind was the approach of the United States Bank to the control of the government. It is nothing remarkable that he should have supported Jackson's policy in fighting for the destruction of the bank and the salvation of the government from becoming an annex to a corporation, for he was a member of Jackson's Administration. But what does show the uncompromising nature of the man is what happened after Jackson had retired and he had become President, with a free hand. He fought a three years' battle which completed the "divorce of State and bank," to use the phrase of those days; in other words, it was he who throttled the bank at last, and he did this despite the fact that he was enmeshed in the panic of 1837, which struck the country directly after his inauguration. Everywhere the panic was being attributed to Jackson's fight against the bank, and a mere politician would have

America's Soul Sought in Its Poetry

HUNTERS OF HEAVEN. By Clement Wood. 351 pp. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. $3.50.

"THE AMERICAN SOUL AS REVEALED BY ITS POETRY" is the subtitle of this pretentious volume, which undertakes to find in the outpourings of our verse writers the key not only to the emotions but to the intellectual tendencies, the moral developments, the social sentiments and status and the psychic outlook of all the vast conglomeration of peoples that make America. Mr. Wood's method of achieving this prodigious task is to examine excerpts from poets whom he regards as representative; he tries to be comprehensive, and does not disregard the Indians, the Eskimos, nor the Southern negro; he turns to the distant past and dwells with loving zest upon all the more licentious bards of England; he advances to the American Colonies, and gives casual attention to various writers from Benjamin Franklin to Mother Goose; and finally, having followed the course of American poetry of the last century, he proceeds to a fairly lengthy section on the verse of today.

The amount of labor that Mr. Wood has accomplished is obviously considerable; the aim of his book is an important and commendable one; and one is therefore sorry to have to report that his aim is not realized. His book is illustrative of a growing recent tendency of critics to make all literature subordinate to a theory and to regard it in the narrow light of some individual bias or assumption. Although Mr. Wood begins by suggesting that poetry represents "the wanderings of men's most adventurous spirit," he does not depict it as a thing that is deeply subjective; he does not portray it as the vehicle by which the yearning and imaginative mind, or the hurt and suffering heart, gives expression to those feelings which are not quite "of the common day." In Mr. Wood's judgment, everything appears to be of the common day, everything is of the earth earthy.

Audubon, Who Was "Called" To Be a Naturalist

His Life Presents an Extraordinary Record of Patience and Industry

John James Audubon.

AUDACIOUS AUDUBON. The Story of a Great Pioneer, Artist, Naturalist and Man. By Edward A. Muschamp. 312 pp. New York: Brentano's. $3.50.*

JOHN JAMES AUDUBON is one of those figures in American history who does not stand in the need of being debunked. Although numerous streets and parks and a society for the protection of birds have been named after him, and though his books and books about him have been fairly well circulated, he has probably had a lesser place in the hearts of his adopted countrymen than he really deserves. Perhaps this is partly because he never did them any harm. He never fought a battle, never ran for Congress, hated to make speeches, and was a failure in every business except the incidental one of getting his great book about the birds of North America published and sold. Mr. Muschamp's brief biography of him is a sometimes naïve but certainly not exaggerated piece of hero worship. It is true that Mr. Muschamp loves to moralize. It is also true that there is no evidence that he has immersed himself very deeply in the manners and customs of Audubon's period. He has simply gotten up the subject by the use of such material as lay readily at hand and set it forth in what is on the whole an interesting fashion. But it would be hard to write a poor biography of Audubon, and that Mr. Muschamp has not done.

The great naturalist was the natural son of a creole woman of Santo Domingo and a French sea captain. The captain, bringing back to France this product of his wanderings, married a widow named Anne Moynet Ricordal, who, strangely enough, brought up the boy with even more than the ordinary mother's affection. Born in 1785, young Audubon lived through the horrors of the French Revolution, under this woman's care, without being emotionally touched by them. His instinctive interest was in birds. He was "called" to be a naturalist as other men have been called to be inventors or reformers. The revolution ate up a large part of his father's once large fortune. At twenty Audubon was sent to America to do what he could to repair it. This was singularly little. The naturalist failed as a planter and as a business man. The only fortunate phase of these adventures was that they brought him into the American wilderness and gave him zest for the great work of his life—the depiction of the birds of America in the gigantic volumes issued under that title and in the "Ornithological Biographies."

Audubon's journeys, partly in search of a livelihood but mainly in search of new birds, took him over nearly the whole of Eastern America, north and south. He crossed Pennsylvania to Pittsburgh when the region between Philadelphia and the former city was almost uninhabited, went down the Ohio to the little city of Louisville, then down the Ste. Genevieve, below St. Louis, and finally to New Orleans, where, as a Frenchman, he found himself quite at home. This was a journey that he made several times, and before he died he knew America from Florida to Labrador and from the Atlantic seaboard to the Mississippi as perhaps no other man of his time did. But all this was not accomplished without dire tribulation. If it had not been for the fact that the naturalist discovered a talent for portrait painting it is possible that he would have ended his days an obscure bankrupt. There were times, indeed, when he literally did not know where his next meal or his next lodging was coming from. He did go through bankruptcy and he was at least once thrown into prison for debt. But he had an unquenchable avidity for life and for the special work which for him constituted the prime reason for being, and he never let himself be crushed.

Perhaps the most audacious feat that Audubon attempted was his journey to England to find a publisher after he had failed to persuade an American to attempt the task. He embarked on his seemingly hopeless venture in 1826, when he was 41 years old, almost penniless and practically unknown in his own field in his adopted country. It was more than twelve years before the book was completed and published. During that period he not only traveled between 30,000 and 35,000 miles by the crude conveyances of the time, drew and colored with meticulous care more than 1,000 birds, but wrote nearly 1,000,000 words of text. He also managed to persuade sufficient purchasers to buy "The Birds of North America" at $1,000 a set to pay the expense of his gigantic enterprise. His ups and downs of fortune were dramatic in the extreme. He was received in the highest society of Edinburgh and London, but he had to sell portraits in order to pay the first few pounds' instalment to the printers of his books, of which he himself finally had to become the publisher. Not until he was well along in his fifties did he enjoy anything like economic security.

The human details of his life are picturesque and moving. He was fortunate in a wife, Lucy Bakewell, daughter of a Pennsylvania farmer, who was not only "his first and only love affair," but was a woman of rare charm, of complete faith and devotion, and of great practicality. Mrs. Audubon was so excellent a teacher that she was able to earn at that profession, a century ago, as much as $3,000 a year. She believed so thoroughly in her husband that she endured financial uncertainty and complete deprivation for half her life in order to advance his work. Audubon himself was a man of no mean resources, and if it had not been for his fantastic interest in birds he might have succeeded in any one of a dozen activities. He "worked as a clerk, merchant, miller and taxidermist; earned money painting portraits, landscapes, street signs, birds, plants, flowers and the interior of an Ohio River steamboat, * * * gave lessons in French, fencing, drawing, dancing and music, * * * and was the author, illustrator, publisher and chief salesman of a number of books." In person, with his long hair, his bold and handsome profile, his glowing eyes and his charm and persuasive manner he was unforgettable. But his principal attributes seem to have been his unalterable conviction that he was right and his invincible determination to do what he had set out to do.

Mr. Muschamp does not pretend that Audubon was in the modern sense a scientific naturalist. He was capable of making serious mistakes, as in his famous description of a rattlesnake pursuing a squirrel from tree top to tree top. He observed and described rather than explained. But he did have that intense love of nature without which natural science is the rattling of dry bones; he inspired other investigators, and he left in his great collection of drawings a monument of unequaled value in its field. One lays down the present volume with a keen desire to penetrate further into this glowing and mysterious life.

Vincent Van Gogh's Tragic Letters to His Brother

FURTHER LETTERS OF VINCENT VAN GOGH TO HIS BROTHER. Illustrated. 488 pp. London: Constable & Co., Ltd. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Company. $7.50.*

THIS completes the Van Gogh letters, two previous volumes of which were published in 1927. The earlier material covered the years 1872-1886; that at hand covers the last years of the artist's life, 1886-1890 (erroneously 1889 on the title page). The three volumes should have come out together; that was prevented, a publisher's note informs us, by "problems of translation and agreement peculiar to this third volume." It is unfortunate that such had to be the case, since the first volume contains a long and intimate memoir by Vincent's sister-in-law; an account essential to full appreciation of the concluding group of letters, published now separately, although, as it is also pointed out, the letters here issued can be read independently, "seeing that they picture Vincent's thoughts and struggles during the last—and in many respects a self-contained—period of his life, when, having left the Low Countries, he went to live in France."

While most of the letters are written to Vincent's brother, Théo, a picture dealer in Paris, a few are to other members of the family; two or three to Gauguin. The book is divided into four natural divisions: Paris, Arles, St. Rémy and Auvers-sur-Oise. The Paris period is very brief, only a few pages, and it is not until Van Gogh arrives at Arles, where so much of his most important work was done, that the narrative, stabbed with flashes of true wisdom, even of wit, becomes genuinely gripping. The letters written during these fevered, crowded, essentially tragic months are of absorbing interest, heartbreaking, and—though all this represents life, not fiction—they weave a story possessing the structure elements of good drama.

Vincent, combating as best he could the persistent mistral, began painting with almost the conscious intensity of one who knows there is no time to lose. His letters, so animated, hysterically verbose, crackle with plans for the future and with discussion of pictures on which he is engaged. Requests for more paints, more canvas, follow thick and fast. It is an orgy of production—

> I have a terrible lucidity at moments, these days when nature is so beautiful. I am not conscious of myself any more and the picture comes to me in a dream.

an orgy animated both with a passion of creation and with a more inchoate yet none the less real desire to advance the cause of the Impressionists. Progress was in the air, > but how difficult for many of us—and assuredly we ourselves are among the number—the future still is! I firmly believe in victory at last, but will the artists themselves have any advantage from it, and will they see less troubled days?

"How I would like to settle down so as to have a home!" Vincent confesses to his brother. Presently, moving from the inn where he had been sleeping and eating (it was a sort of "night café"), he engaged a small house that afforded him a studio in which to work. From the first he longed to share it with other artists, convinced that two or even three, by banding together, could live more cheaply than one, and also arguing the benefit to be derived from mutual effort in the same direction. What he seems equally to have been combating, though this did not figure so prominently in the accounts sent to Théo, was an increasing burden of loneliness. He had his heart set on getting Gauguin down there from Pont-Aven. Théo, in Paris, who was already supporting Vincent, agreed to take bankrupt Gauguin also under his wing, the latter to send him some canvases in return.

Through an almost endless series of letters Vincent pursues this plan in its myriad phases. We see him gradually picking up a few pieces of furniture for the house; two beds, some chairs and chests of drawers. His delight in this preparation is that of a child. He sets to work painting sunflowers for the decoration of Gauguin's room. Affection for the little house that under his hand seems taking on something, at least, of the aspect of home reaches such deep pathos as to draw tears. And at last Gauguin did arrive.

But a more sinister climax impeded; Vincent was dwelling now on the edge of chaos. In the course of a few weeks the two quarreled and, the day before Christmas, Théo received a frantic wire from Gauguin stating that Vincent, "in a state of terrible excitement and high fever, had cut off a piece of his own ear and brought it as a gift to a woman in a brothel." One of the frightful brain attacks had come on. When at length Vincent's letters to Théo resume, they are written on the stationery of a hospital in Arles. Everything is over, so far as "home" is concerned. Not again was he able to live in the little house with its studio, which had meant so much to him. Gauguin had returned North. And after a time Vincent was taken to St. Rémy and placed in an asylum there.

Between attacks Vincent's mind would be more or less clear. He knew precisely what ailed him; frankly faced his misery, and meanwhile was tragically hoping, each time, that there would be no more relapses. He still could feebly reiterate his forlorn wisp of philosophy—that this was, in truth, "the best of all possible worlds"—and kept his face toward the future. Vincent Van Gogh may fail to strike one as heroic; nevertheless it is scarcely possible not to be struck with the quality of his courage. And, although the "grand" period of production had ended, he went on painting pictures—many superb ones, too. The famous "Paveurs," included in the opening exhibition of the Museum of Modern Art in New York, was one of the last things done at St. Rémy.

The low spells at St. Rémy were very bad. Recovering from one of particularly long duration, he determined that it would be best to leave the South. He felt himself drawn back to Paris and Théo and Théo's wife, Jo, who now had a baby. The journey was undertaken, and shortly thereafter Vincent was settled in the country not far from them. The final letters were written to Théo from Auvers-sur-Oise. They cease abruptly with one that was found, partly completed, in his pocket after his death. Characteristically it breaks off with the phrase: "but what's the use?"

Two Views of Marshal Foch

General Sir George Aston Writes the First Complete Biography in English—M. Recouly's Recorded Conversations

THE BIOGRAPHY OF THE LATE MARSHAL FOCH. By Major Gen. Sir George Aston, K. C. B. New York: The Macmillan Company. $5.

FOCH—MY CONVERSATIONS WITH THE MARSHAL. By Raymond Recouly. Translated by Joyce Davis. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $3.

By L. V. UPDEGRAFF

GENERAL ASTON has written the first complete biography of Marshal Foch in English. M. Recouly, French journalist, was among the first of the Marshal's friends and confidants to produce a record of his private thoughts on the war and the peace. The two books faithfully confirm and support each other, both as to a knowledge of the character of Marshal Foch and as to the peculiar qualities of his leadership.

General Aston gives us Foch "through English eyes"; the records he uses are mostly English, and it is no minor tribute to the French generalissimo that he should appear so lofty a character and his command of the allied troops so magnificent a performance when looked at "through English eyes." There were periods of strain between French and British and between French and Americans. That they were not allowed to become so serious as to interfere with the allied victory appears from this military record to be due to Foch, Haig and Pershing rather than to Clemenceau, Lloyd George and the other civilian chiefs. On this point even the military record is not yet complete; the diaries of Field Marshal Haig will doubtless have much to say about the supreme command, as will Pershing's memoirs. Foch's own military journal has not yet been made public.

But the material on Foch from the British side is fairly complete, and General Aston has had the additional advantage of being able to consult many British officers who were closely associated with the Unified Command. Enough is clear to show that Foch's own statement of how he exercised his command—a matter of exposition and persuasion—was true; and it is also clear that Field Marshal Haig on more than one occasion took upon himself the responsibility of decisions which would have caused doubt and objection if left to the civilian War Council in London.

The long life of Foch which General Aston records, from his childhood among the Pyrenees to the State funeral in Notre Dame, had a unity found in few lives of famous or inconspicuous men in that it all led up to a climax long foreseen and then gradually burned downward to a peaceful close. There was nothing unusual in Foch's youth, which was spent in the strict discipline of French schools. The definite trend of his character seems to have been given by his Jesuit instructors. He was not one to be marked out at once for a military career; it was the mystic in him which turned him into the military life instead of away from it, as one would expect. It was not ambition for a conquering hero's laurels but the profound impression made upon him by the humiliation of France by Germany and the loss of Alsace and Lorraine which brought him into the army. Even then he strongly believed the time would come when the humiliation would be wiped out and that he would somehow have a big part in the "revanche."

Death Mask of Marshal Foch.

Foch was nearly 63 years old when the war began in August, 1914, and 66 when he was called to the supreme command in March, 1918. For more than forty years he had been preparing himself for just this crisis. How he began the war at the Battle of the Marne is a familiar story and one part of his career that Foch himself has made particularly plain. It is when he comes to the command of British armies in France that Foch "through English eyes" becomes a unique figure in history.

To English eyes the supreme command exercised by Foch is a thing that needs to be carefully defined and its limitations kept in mind. General Aston points out that it was not really a supreme command, that Foch was never a complete generalissimo. The "Beauvais agreement" stood in the way, and under the "Beauvais agreement" the British or American commander might appeal over the head of Foch to his home government in case he considered any of the Foch arrangements endangered his forces. When Foch undertook to direct all the allied armies in France he was, therefore, bound to consider a possible refusal to carry out an order, and he was also bound to consider Clemenceau in respect to any operations involving French troops.

Under the "Beauvais agreement" the question is raised whether the unified command would have been a success if it had been applied earlier and whether it would have stood as successfully in bad times as in good. The rapid success of the Allies put all differences into the background, though differences were never absent, and as late as October, 1918, we have Haig appealing to the London Cabinet to make Foch release his Second Army. We find also continual complaint of the British to Foch that they were bearing too large a part of the sacrifices and the French pressing for more British divisions at the front.

These disputes, which might have seriously affected the conduct of the war, were forgotten in the sweeping success of Foch's strategy. Foch "through English eyes" receives full credit for that success, although it is true that some of the most brilliant operations, like the British offensive of Aug. 8, 1918, were proposed by others—in the case of the British offensive by Rawlinson and supported by Haig. The British officer writing this life of Foch pays a handsome tribute to the chief allied commander on this point of honor due:

> Foch's greatness lay in his readiness to bear the responsibility not only for a single operation on one portion of the front, but for those along the whole front in France and Flanders, making the best use of the vast horde of troops assembled for the greatest battle in the world's history. As long as a commander would secure the object that Foch intended, he might do so in his own way. To him should be applied the verdict that he gave himself upon the issue raised between Joffre and Gallieni about credit for victory in the first Battle of the Marne, in September, 1914: "It was Gallieni's idea. Joffre bore the responsibility. The credit is Joffre's."

Marshal Foch.

From the Portrait by Sir William Orpen.

If this view of Foch "through English eyes" prevails, there is no danger that any one will arise to dispute his right to be named first among those to whom credit is due for bringing the war to a complete allied victory. He undertook his command during a grave crisis of an apparently lost battle. His policy, General Aston says, > had been to send help to the British when Pétain was just about to break away from them, drawing back his left to cover Paris. What would have followed upon the separation between the allied armies we do not know—certainly not victory in the field. His policy in April had been to maintain the British front at a time when many British experts, including his friend, Henry Wilson, spoke of shortening the line of defense, of retiring, of flooding the country with sea water, and even of abandoning the Channel ports to the enemy. Foch's next supreme test came in May and June, but his nerve failed for a moment. He constantly prepared for a counter-stroke when others did not believe that a general offensive would be possible before the Spring of 1919.

Thus Foch deserves "the supreme recompense," in the opinion of his British biographer. To the correctness of his strategy is to be added that other and, in Foch's judgment, more important element in war, the "imponderable," the moral factor, the fixed belief that the battle is not lost until it is thought lost. English eyes see in Foch a leader who made the "will to victory" a vital part of his leadership. And finally he was a leader who was ready for peace at the earliest it could be matched with victory. By withholding the armistice a few weeks he might have been the one associated forever with the invasion and complete subjugation of Germany. He was satisfied to stop the war with the allied troops on the Rhine.

This life of Foch, particularly his military life, as it appears from British war records, coincides in spirit and philosophy with the talk of the Marshal with a journalist he trusted implicity. M. Recouly, like Commandant Bugnet and General Weygand, gives us an insight into Foch's private thoughts on great matters. His book is in part sensational, in part controversial. It stirred Clemenceau to promise a rejoinder. Now that the "Father of Victory" has quitted the stage, it is not likely that their duel will be taken up by others.

Here is Foch's complaint in full as told to Recouly. Its burden is that Clemenceau declined to fight for the Rhine military frontier for France in the Peace Treaty. Foch believed it could have been obtained, but in his strictly military view of the peace terms, he seems to disregard President Wilson and Lloyd George and opinion in Britain and America as definite barriers to the dismemberment of Germany in the west, as well as the fiasco of the Rhineland movement encouraged by Frenchmen during the Ruhr occupation.

Excerpts from this book have appeared already in THE NEW YORK TIMES Magazine. Here is the complete translation—Foch on the supreme command, Foch and the American Army, the story of the armistice, Foch on Joffre, Foch on Ludendorff, Foch on the battle of the Marne, Foch on Napoleon, Foch on war of the future and military history. A large part of the book is taken up with the Peace Treaty and Clemenceau, and a score of miscellaneous and personal conversations follow dealing with day-to day happenings after the war. Here Foch himself is speaking; the peculiar qualities of his genius stand out; the simplicity and the greatness of his character glow through the dialogue.

The talk bears witness to the disappointment which beset the great soldier in his last years, and his portraits show a face that grew sadder though not less serene as his life came to a close.

War and Peace in Poignant Contrast

THE WET FLANDERS PLAIN. By Henry Williamson. 122 pp. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc. $2.

A LITTLE book, this, but, as it were, like the force of gravity, its power and its beauty vary inversely with its square. Mr. Williamson, an Englishman, whose nature sketches and novel "The Pathway" have won him a following, went through all four years of the great war, "a soldier of the line." He was in Flanders throughout the successive campaigns. Or was it only one continuous, and seemingly endless, campaign? But it ended, and the war ended, a decade ago. And this year it occurred to Williamson that he would like to revisit the former scene of desolation and toil and blood. "The Wet Flanders Plain" is, roughly speaking, his account of this journey. But it is also far more. The book has a spiritual body as well as a material body; and it is the spiritual body which makes it important, and, one ventures to predict, probably lasting, and this in spite of its modest and self-effacing mien.

The method which Mr. Williamson has followed is simple in the extreme. The Flanders visit consumed nine days, during which time the author walked over the battle-scarred and battle-redeemed terrain. A few paragraphs will be devoted to the present scene; then how it appeared in wartime will be vividly and poignantly sketched. Then back to the present again, then another revivification of the past.

> Ypres [writes Williamson] is today unrecognizable. Wipers exists in the memory only. The city today is clean and new and hybrid-English. The rectangular ruined fragment of the Cloth Hall is contained in its scaffold box. Grasses and wildflowers on the tops of the walls make the ruin beautiful. In the Spring the jackdaws feed their young in the nests within the masonry gaps on high. But I walked on the ramparts with another man—the wraith of my old (or my very young) self.

Williamson walks upon the ramparts of Ypres, and, after a time, seeks the cheer of a café.

> But the café scene fades, and I am a wraith again in the darkness rushing by, yet stagnant amid the soundless cries, the viewless white flashes of field guns lighting the broken wall and the scattered rubble; the misery of men marching, laden and sweating, through the ruin of the Menin Gate. Passing strings of men slouching away from the line, thinking only of sleep, sleep, sleep; slouching on, anywhere,

Casanova Was More Than A Mere Don Juan

A Restless Adventurer and Intellectual, He Touched Life at Many Points

CASANOVA, His Known and Unknown Life. By Guy E. Endore. 390 pp. New York: The John Day Co. $5.

CASANOVA LOVED HER. By Bruno Brunelli, with a preface by Arthur Machen. Translated by Alexander McKechnie. 299 pp. New York: Horace Liveright. $3.50.

By HERBERT L. MATTHEWS

IN each epoch there are one or two characters who stride their world like colossi, and in whose life and nature is summed up all that is typical of their period. Such a figure was Casanova, "the charlatan, the braggart, the cardsharp, the liar, forger, adulterer, seducer, jailbird"—but infinitely more than that, a man who lived his life to its utmost possibilities and with tremendous gusto, a great lover, a daring gambler and a brave and true friend. Best of all, he was a literary genius, whose one great accomplishment ranks him with the immortals. About those memoirs of his a fund of scholarship has been amassed whose total, in every European language, is already beyond the capability of any one man to embrace.

Every year new works see the light—biographies, fiction, criticism, plays. And here are two more studies, the one a new biography which will certainly take its place with the best that have been written about Casanova, the other a brilliant piece of scholarship in which an episode of the Memoirs is partially authenticated.

All Casanovists can be divided into three schools on this question of authenticity. There are those, like Gugitz, who profess to see nothing but romanticising in the great panorama of events Casanova puts before his readers. There are others, of whom Arthur Machen, English translator of the Memoirs and writer of the preface to one of the two books under review, is one, who believe that "whatever record leaps to light, it seems that Casanova never will be shamed; at all events on the accusation of lying." Dr. Brunelli himself holds that the Memoirs "provide the most perfect picture we possess of life in the eighteenth century, and a picture, moreover, the accuracy of which has again and again been substantiated."

Midway between these two are the eclectics like Mr. Endore, who weigh the true and the false in the balance and, accepting both as equally indicative of Casanova the man, consider the Memoirs as an historical novel.

The scholarly background of this biography is wholly admirable, and in these days when hundreds are rushing to print with journalistic lives of great men, Mr. Endore deserves the highest commendation for his patient research and careful collation of source and commentary that must have taken years of study. It is not hack work, but a labor of love by one who must surely have made Casanova his life hobby.

So long as he has the Memoirs to follow, Mr. Endore's technique consists in summarizing them briefly and then discussing the authenticity of the passage in question, and although in his introduction he leads the reader to believe there is more of fiction than truth in the autobiography, he actually upholds Casanova most of the time.

There is, for instance, a long passage in the Memoirs devoted to Casanova's first visit to Paris. After summarizing it, Mr. Endore writes: "In all this we have followed Casanova's own tale of himself, for there is nothing to lead us to believe that in essence it is not true." After retelling the account of Casanova's famous escape from the Leads in Venice, the biographer says: "Though we now possess so great a number of documents that, had Casanova never written a word we could still tell the tale in full, we have yet used his own words as source, because they seem to us to ring true." So it goes with Casanova's account of his share in the Paris lottery, of "the period between the years 1757 and 1760," of his second visit to Paris, of his German adventures, of his interview with Voltaire, of his relations with Mme. d'Urfé, of his duel with Branicki, and many other episodes.

The Memoirs end in the year 1774, with Casanova on the verge of getting permission to return to his beloved Venice. He lived for twenty-three years longer, a sad, embittered, disillusioned existence, the first ten years of which offer many enigmas to scholar and critic. As Mr. Endore says, "Most readers know only the Casanova, hero of his own Memoirs; but the lowly police spy and the prolific writer of forgotten novels, libelous pamphlets, histories, poems, biographies and mathematical works whom we shall meet here is Casanova, too. And a knowledge of this new Casanova is necessary for a complete picture of a man who was not merely a Don Juan."

He even turned moralist and reformer for a while! But the old joy of life was gone, and with it the daring that led him to storm with assured success the most impregnable hearts, and stake on one turn of the cards a fortune great enough to have enabled him to live in ease that last, unhappy quarter-century. He had his last mistress in those years—Francesca Buschini, the poor seamstress, to whom he was faithful for more years than the weeks he used to devote to titled beauties.

And then he had to leave once again, this time on a weary round of sordid adventures until at last he found haven in Dux, with the generous patron who was to harbor him, in a peace and comfort he did not appreciate, for the last thirteen years of his life—Count Waldstein, the nephew of another sincere friend of his last days, the Prince de Ligne.

There he wrote prodigiously, for nine hours a day, on every conceivable subject, at the same time keeping up a correspondence with innumerable friends and acquaintances scattered over Europe. He was bored, unhappy and restless. "Writing my Memoirs," he said, "was the only remedy I had against the certainty of going crazy or dying of chagrin amid the annoyances and vexations which I have to submit to daily from the envious scoundrels who are here with me at the castle at Dux."

He wrote more things than his Memoirs, and so, too, he must have spent many hours dreaming of the days when he drove over Europe in a magnificent coach and six, conquering every heart he met. Those women! How often their ghosts must have risen to confront him, there in Dux, bringing sad, sweet memories of bygone days!

One of those ghosts was a certain Mlle. X. C. V., whom readers of the Memoirs will readily remember. Casanova fell madly in love with her on one of his visits to Paris. At that time, as indeed throughout all her life, she professed inability to love any but Andrea Memmo, the young Venetian patrician, who was her first lover, and with whom she had known two months of passionate happiness in the city of canals.

But Casanova held high hopes until, late one night, a courier brought him an urgent note from the mademoiselle, begging him to help her, for she was pregnant. Casanova, after using her distress unscrupulously to satisfy his own desires, arranged to have her spirited away to a convent, where she remained in hiding until the child was born, and where a complacent abbess whitewashed her name for social usage.

Such, very briefly, is the story in the Memoirs. It was to protect the girl's honor that Casanova called

Telling a Story in Woodcuts

GOD'S MAN. A Novel in Woodcuts. By Lynd Ward. New York: Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

"GOD'S MAN," a novel in woodcuts, brings to the United States for general absorption a device for telling a story that has, according to information seeping out from the cable offices, been hailed with delight in Germany, France and Belgium. Evidently the woodcut artists (and they might as well be painters or sculptors, for if a story can be told in woodcuts it can be told in pictures or statues) have been impressed with the attempts of poets and prose writers who have Jabberwocky and Joycean leanings. The argument that ran riot in the head of the first person to "write" a novel in terms of woodcuts may have gone like this: If the poet or prose writer can usurp the functions of the painter, the sculptor and the musician, and attempt to get painting, sculptural and musical effects, pure and simple, through the medium of words, why can't I get a dramatic effect through the medium of a succession of pictures?

Or perhaps the rise of the moving picture has something to do with the woodcut novel. In which case the initial argument may have been something like this: If people are sick of wading through words and words and words to get a story, to explore situations, to be stirred, why not bring the method of the moving picture theatre into their homes by presenting them with a series of pictures that will convey a dramatic story in book form?

But no matter what the genesis of the novel in woodcuts, it has at length reached America. The idea is spreading, as Lynd Ward's "God's Man" is here to tell us. The story of "God's Man" is that of a young painter who makes a bargain with some symbolic person that, in return for signing some esoteric compact, brings him the ability to penetrate with the artist's brush a short way into the mysteries of life. He paints, he sells his paintings, he meets a prostitute. With the idealism of adolescence, he must needs see all Womanhood (the capital is important) in the prostitute. Hence when he glimpses the brand of the dollar mark on her shoulder he is bowled over. He flies into the streets, but in his agony there is no escape; he sees the woman in the arms of policeman, bystander, judge and priest. At length he works himself out of his madness and meets the Wife. A few happy months or years pass. He paints. Then the mysterious stranger, the Mephistophelian enigma, returns to claim his pound of flesh. He unrolls the scroll of the compact, tears off his mask, and the artist stares at a death'ahead. The end of creation is, evidently, death.

All this is a familiar story, the traditional story of many an artist. But how does a succession of woodcuts tell the story? Does this succession get its intentional effect? If Mr. Ward wanted us to be continually stirred to pity, to fear, the answer must be No. Occasionally, as in Part IV, The Wife, we are properly moved to compassion. But more often we are moved to a rude laughter. Is this because the story of a young man's disillusion cannot be told effectively in terms of melodramatic symbols? Perhaps. The genre itself might be made an effective one; it might be very effective with a different sort of story. We need a few more woodcut novels before we decide to throw them out of court as little more than a new toy.

Religious Fervor and Beauty In Miss Ridge's Poem

Her Narrative of the Crucifixion Brings New Dignity To Contemporary Verse

FIREHEAD. By Lola Ridge. 218 pp. New York: Payson & Clarke, Ltd. $2.50.

By PERCY HUTCHISON

THE idea animating "Firehead," by Lola Ridge, is of more poetic daring than is usual with modern poets. Miss Ridge has taken the events of a single day in the history of civilization, the day of the crucifixion, and, looking at that event through the eyes of certain of the witnesses of the tragedy on Calvary, has produced a tapestry of unusual design, one interwoven of color, human passion and religious fervor. The critic approaches such a work feeling something of restraint, for, although the presonal element that went to the making of "Firehead" is well dissembled, he is aware of its presence. The author's soul has gone into the making of the poem; and one is a bit abashed when confronted with a soul.

Among the several persons of the poem (which is in no wise put forth as a drama) are Christ himself, John the disciple, Judas, Mary, mother of Christ; Mary Magdalene and Peter. No part of this singular and rather awesome work will evoke more critical enthusiasm than the canto (if the word may be used) in which Miss Ridge introduces the martyred Jesus. Mingling reticence and daring, ecstasy and horror, stern realism and religion's transmutations of the meaning of the scene, and using a cunnning variety of meters, she has accomplished something not hitherto attempted by a modern poet. One feels hovering over the lines something of the spirit of Crashawe, perhaps, even, something of the spirit of Dante. The lines of "Firehead" scorch and burn.

The poem begins upon a note of natural beauty.

The day was arteried with fire. Beyond
The golden body of the sand
That stretched out torpidly, the sun
Came raging on Jerusalem.

But the living Man has been nailed upon the cross.

His spindling body, like a vine,
Was stretched as still twixt earth and sky
As anything alive might lie between
Between two lions' paws.

The crowd swarms upon Calvary, drawn by the grim spectacle, "young Romans, delicately perfumed"; workmen, money-changers, publicans, in short, the high and the low of Jerusalem, and among them, bent under their sorrow, those who had been associated with Jesus in the days that had passed. Both mood and measure change. The figure on the cross reviews his life, its dreams and accomplishments, its disappointments and agonies. The kiss of Judas, "faintly malodorous, like a jonquil that had lain too long on the breast of a dead man," and "the warm kiss of Mary and pressure of John's bright head."

All blent in a vast music not again
To sound apart in any separate strain
But move in the clear whole wherein He whirled
Incandescent, in the pillared flame
Of music that is time made audible.

Then, at length, the physical comes.

The little wind that licked His face
Was the only thing that moved,
The little wind that hushed itself
And crept down to the sea.
And dawn as white as Mary came
On the horizon, strangerly.

Earth quaffed the morning pure and cold
*As a long drink. * * **
When the east was rosy as a grape
Before it purples, and alone
Venus, on the milky nape
Of morning, slavered by the sea,
Glimmered like a precious stone
There gaped, in darkness, emptily,
The blackened scabbard of His mouth
That held a blessing's shape.

Those whose senses have been dulled with the paucity of imagination and emotion that brings so much of contemporary verse to a monotonous level of attainment will find themselves stung tinglingly awake by Miss Ridge's multiplicity of images, drawn impartially from religious or secular sources, and the vibrant quality of her lines. In these things she is closely akin to Edwin Arlington Robinson in his unmatched "Tristram." Here, for instance:

She might have been a wounded thing,
Cast down from some high wall of space,
She lay with such beseeching grace,
One arm bent backward, like a wing.

The lines are from the portion of the book in which Judas is analyzed with a pitiless scorn that is withering. Although for the moment one is slightly misled by the romantic touch, it is but for a moment. The perfidy of Judas is the more strikingly brought out thereby. Nowhere else is the poem more powerful; or rises, perhaps, to such dramatic height. "The Firehead," in its final canto, running beyond its limit of one day, ends with a pean of joy over the resurrection.

Coming in this time of skepticism and of generally circumscribed lyric accomplishment in poetry, Miss Ridge's work strikes a positive note that stamps it as very far indeed from negligible. One will not find in it the religious absorption to be met in the poems of Alice Meynell or the ecstasy of mysticism that makes Crashawe's "Flaming Heart" a thing unique in English poetry. And even though there may be remotely something of the spirit of Dante, Lola Ridge can show neither the high implacability of the author of "The Divine Comedy" or the cosmic pity of such a line as his:

In la sua volontade è nostra pace.

Nevertheless, among religious poems, especially among religious poems of today, "The Firehead" must be given a very high place. It is forceful and beautiful, a work in which imagination and intelligence fuse in a white flame.

DR. JOHNSON AND MR. BOSWELL. By Harry Salpeter. Illustrated. 265 pp. New York: Coward-Cann. $3.50.

By UFFINGTON VALENTINE

ACHAGRINED Dr. Johnson it must be today if that bulky object of contemporary adulation is aware of the revenge time has brought round in his case. Accustomed to view the sedulous Boswell as a mere appendage to his own eternal greatness, it could hardly be soothing to complacence to realize what his perpetuation into our times owes to that patronized shadow. Nor is the fact that the Boswellian shadow is so largely responsible for Johnson substance in our eyes the only new finding about the pair. Boswell, the once commonly contemned figure of letters, is now regarded in a far different, grace-saving light, thanks to a juster biographical spirit and recent unearthings of his pen that prove the full measure of his literary worth.

Harry Salpeter, in his engagingly written "Doctor Johnson and Mr. Boswell," sums up this modern justice to "Bozzy," and, while willingly according the doctor his deserts as a causeur, frankly avows his opinion as to his works and their claim on the world's remembrance. All except "The Lives of the Poets" he considers meriting the dust that has gathered on them. As to Boswell's productions, Mr. Salpeter sees, in addition to the "Life," a permanent high value in the "Private Papers," which, purchased from the author's great-great-grandson, Lord Talbot de Malahide by Colonel Ralph E. Isham, are at last seeing the day. He says:

These diaries and letters which have come out of Boswell's ebony cabinet, added to the letters he wrote to Temple and others, will serve to put Boswell by the side of Pepys, for no more than the little diarist of the Admiralty did Boswell serve the reticences. These papers are justifying the faith of those who had felt that Boswell also was a vivid and various personality. At the very least we shall be supplied with some fascinating footnotes to the large body of Boswelliana already in our possession. We shall be informed, in somewhat fuller detail, of Boswell's rich, independent, non-Johnsonian life. Frederick Albert Pottle's bibliography of Boswell, "The Literary Career of James Boswell, Esq.," opens our eyes to the magnitude of Boswell's literary industry, the variety of his literary enterprises and the justification for his literary reputation; it stresses the non-Johnsonian aspect of Boswell's life from a literary point of view as new knowledge of his life stresses that aspect from a personal point of view. When the publication of "The Boswell Papers" shall have been completed we shall have not only new material on such of Johnson's contemporaries as Reynolds, Goldsmith and Burke, but also—what the late Geoffrey Scott, who had been editing these volumes up to the time of his sudden death, regarded as most important—the record of Boswell's post-Johnson life.

In contrast to the prodigious industry of Boswell's is Johnson's own literary apathy. Mr. Salpeter states that Johnson never wrote "without a groan," citing various anecdotes in confirmation of it. There is Johnson's reply of "You may well wonder!" to the lady who wondered that he preferred not to write. And on the Scottish journey he expressed to Boswell his surprise that "so many people have written who might have let it alone." On another occasion he remarked, "No man but a blockhead ever wrote, except for money.". Again, when at Oxford, in 1776, when it was suggested to him that he write a book in support of Church and State, he burst out with "Why should I be always writing?" Over this constitutional indolence, this distaste for writing, one argument was known to prevail—"the motive of humanity." Mr. Salpeter paraphrases an illustration of its appeal to Johnson related by Boswell, who got the anecdote from one of Johnson's Birminghanf friends.

In Birmingham, prior to his London days, Johnson was commissioned to translate from the French a "Voyage to Abyssinia" by a Portuguese Jesuit named Jerome Lobo, and eventually he furnished the printer with the first portion of the Englishing. Then his industry subsided, and the only means by which he could be induced to proceed with the translation was to represent to him that the printer was unable to undertake any other orders till the job was done and that he and his family were suffering.

This [comments Mr. Salpeter] is the Johnson who picked up a starving girl from the London gutter and gave her refuge in his home for many weeks, who sheltered Lovett and blind Mrs. Williams and Miss Carmichael and Mrs. Desmoulins and sent his negro servant to be educated and helped rescue Goldsmith from the baliffic wrath of an unpaid landlady and put pennies into the hands of sleeping waifs so that when they awoke they would find the price of a breakfast, and spent himself in dozens of similar services even when in deep need himself.

It is Mr. Salpeter's appreciation of all the character values of both Johnson and Boswell that makes his study of them so praiseworthy. To obtain such balanced portraiture he has spared himself no pains, as is shown by his citations of research in the postscript to the volume. The "Life" has, of course, been his fountainhead of resort; to its abundant flow all other knowledge of the pair is merely supplementary. Except for that work the immortalizing of Johnson as a talker—his truest claim to genius—would never have been achieved. There we have not the hearsays but the evidence of that genius. What has been perhaps overlooked and what Mr. Salpeter emphasizes is the rôle Boswell filled as inspirator of it. Johnson's talk had to be provoked, and Boswell devoted himself to provoking as well as reporting it.

Johnson's talk, as Mr. Salpeter tells us, had a "psychological intention."

Robust of frame though he seemed, he was physically ill for the greater part of his life, and mentally ill, too. He was tormented by the fear of insanity and death, haunted by an exacting conscience. He would prolong talk, rather than cut it short, once talk was launched, for according to Boswell's experience, he rarely spoke until he was addressed, and he would sometimes lose himself in a book if the company were not pleasing to him. During such periods, as he was not an abstainer, he would drink wine as a substitute for companionship, "to get rid of myself, to send myself away."

His love of tavern life and his organization of clubs had the same motive.

He was at some tavern until late, at Mrs. Williams's before she took up her quarters with him, at the Thrales' later; in the morning he was the centre of a levee. Whatever inconvenience he suffered in providing shelter to his nondescript crew, they at least provided him with company, voluntary or involuntary, grateful or ungrateful.

This need shows how easy to obtain was that association which Boswell sought so eagerly and accounted such a privilege.

That Boswell was never satisfied to bask idly in Johnson's glory, but from the beginning planned to turn the companionship to his own literary advantage Mr. Salpeter thinks unquestionable. There is evidence to that effect, he finds, in the "Life" itself. Before meeting

News and Views of Literary London

LONDON.

THE most important work on the subject that has appeared for a long time is Dr. Cyril Norwood's "The English Tradition of Education" (Murray). Its author's personal record is an unusual one. After a brilliant career at Oxford, he headed the list in the competition for posts in the higher civil service. He soon left Whitehall, however, to take a classical mastership at Leeds Grammar School. Since then he has held the headship of Bristol Grammar School and Marlborough College successively, and is now head master of Harrow. He has accordingly had first-hand experience of both day and boarding schools of varied types. In this volume he surveys the whole field of secondary education and expresses his mature judgment on the problems that arise in it. It would be difficult to find anywhere a more authoritative statement of the case for the traditional English "public school" education as it has taken shape during the last century under the inspiration of Thomas Arnold and Edward Thring. In the course of his argument Dr. Norwood makes a dignified and conclusive reply to the attacks of Lytton Strachey and Bertrand Russell. This is not only a well-informed but a sane and fair-minded book, suffused with a restrained fervor and enlivened with many humorous touches. It will be especially valuable as a warning against the over-mechanization of education and against the vogue of an individualism that would make self-expression the aim of all teaching without regard to the quality of the self that is being expressed.

At the same time, Longmans's new English Heritage series has given us, from a non-professional point of view, a lighter but useful and well-written book by Bernard Darwin on "The English Public School." The friends of the older curriculum will heartily welcome G. M. Sargeaunt's "Classical Studies" (Chatto) and Professor A. W. Pickard-Cambridge's inaugural lecture on "The Present Position and Aims of Greek Studies" (Thin). "A Modern Philosophy of Education" (Allen) is by another Edinburgh professor, Dr. G. H. Thomson. Dr. Alexander Morgan has produced a volume of sketches of "Makers of Scottish Education" (Longmans). "The Activity School" (Allen) is a translation of a work by Adolphe Ferrière which expounds the principles and ideals of the educational movement whose slogan is "education by Doing." A. Victor Murray's "The School in the Bush" (Longmans) is a critical study of the theory and practice of native education in Africa. "The Foundations of History Teaching" (Oxford Press), by F. Clarke of McGill is a plea for a new and more interesting method.

MARY BORDEN'S "The Forbidden Zone" (Heinemann) consists of sketches of the war as she saw it from the mobile field hospital she superintended just behind the French trenches and within big-gun range. . . . Rowland Feilding's "War Letters to a Wife: France and Flanders, 1915-19" (Medici Society) gives an admirable picture of the life of a keen commander of an infantry battalion. . . . At the age of 33 Robert Graves, the poet, has written an autobiography, "Good-bye to All That" (Cape). Its war scenes, in particular, are extraordinarily vivid. . . . Colonel Lionel James's "Times of Stress" (Murray), though mainly a narrative of personal adventure, contains a serious discussion of the official attitude to newspaper correspondents in the World War.

"Ephesian," the biographer of Lord Birkenhead, has prepared for Cassell's a study of Philip Snowden . . . Charles J. Phillips has written for the same publishers a history of the Sackville family, of which a former Minister to Washington was a member. . . . Sir Francis Vane's "Agin the Governments" (Low) tells the life story of an adventurous soldier who has often found himself in conflict with authority. . . . Professor Edward Westermarck's "Memories of My Life" (Allen) is a by-product of the general strike of 1926. At the time he was staying at his country home in Surrey, and, with nothing else on hand to do, he began to jot down his recollections. . . . One of the most amusing books published for a long time is Rachel Ferguson's "Sara Skelton: The Autobiography of a Famous Actress" (Besant), a brilliant parody on the normal style of theatrical memoirs.

A FASCINATING memoir by Norman H. Baynes introduces the bibliography which the Cambridge University Press has issued of the works of J. B. Bury. . . . The late Professor T. F. Sir Richard Lodge has completed a volume of "Studies in Eighteenth Century Diplomacy" (Murray). . . . The difficulties of the British Government in maintaining an armed maritime police and making it effective by diplomacy figure prominently in Dr. W. L. Mathieson's study of "Great Britain and the Slave Trade, 1839-65" (Longmans). . . . G. M. Thomson, who has made so many fellow-Scotsmen wince by his pungent criticism of the national characteristics, may possibly redress the balance by his "Short History of Scotland" (Rutledge).

A speaker at the annual dinner of the Manchester Dickens Fellowship remarked that Dickens seemed to like his villains scarcely less than his heroes, whereas some modern novelists did not seem to like even their heroes. . . . A book of short stories, says Edward Garnett, gives the imagination more to work on than does the ordinary novel. For the literary artist modern life, as the pace gets faster, is more and more an affair of episodes, of momentary contacts; and the great majority of his fleeting impressions cannot be harmonized and utilized in the necessarily restricted plan of a novel.

Arno Holz and His Influence In Germany

BERLIN.

WITH the passing of Arno Holz, who has died at the age of 65, we have lost another writer of the generation that worked toward a reshaping of German literature. All students of German literature knew his name and that he was the first to raise the standard of consistent naturalism. Hauptmann received a definite stimulus from him and ungrudgingly recognized his leadership. The drama "Familie Selicke," which Arno Holz wrote in collaboration with his friend Johannes Schlaf, aroused a furious controversy. Its characters did not speak with well-articulated words but made primitive sounds such as are uttered by the poor and uneducated under the stress of joy or sorrow. Unquestionably Arno Holz taught many a poet to sing as he felt, disregarding esthetic or other regulations. There is no doubt that he freed the German language from the yoke of conventionality which was threatening to stifle it. But this rigidly obstinate mind made new iron-bound rules of the new concepts he had gained. He forbade all rhyming in poetry, substituting rhythm instead. His great collection of poems—to which, as a consistent naturalist, he gave the title "Phantasus"—presented an entirely novel stylistic aspect which people found difficult to understand. In the course of Arno Holz's life this "Phantasus" grew to an enormous quarto volume.

In "Die Blechschmiede" he gave full vent to his wrath over what he regarded as the muddled and degenerated condition of contemporary literature.

ALTHOUGH there is much genius in the work of Arno Holz this herald of new forms did not himself achieve a perfected literary form. His preachings were born of the intellect; his poetry was laboriously thought out, not intuitively conceived. He was a thinker on poetry, not a poet by the grace of Apollo. We grow sad as we remember that the only great popular success he enjoyed was gained with his comedy "Traumulus," in which he was unfaithful to his ideas. Except for this incident his entire life was a constant, unyielding struggle for his convictions. His friends and admirers deserted him to go their own ways, which took them far from the rules laid down by Arno Holz. His name remained well known, but his works will not be more than difficult though valuable material for scientific students of literary history. His embitterment at the apparent ingratitude of his country never gave him the slightest doubt as to the worth and necessity of his mission. Thus Arno Holz, despite considerable financial difficulties, lived the life of a proudly sincere and self-confident warrior.

ANOTHER author who was recently claimed by death is brought back to us by a profoundly vital and infinitely charming book published by the Insel Verlag this Fall: The first volume of selections from the many letters left by Rainer Maria Rilke. This correspondence has been very carefully and understandingly classified and edited by his daughter Ruth and her husband. We might feel that the fact that all personal and incidental elements have been eliminated constitutes a fault did we not realize that in this the editors followed the spirit and the wishes of that exceedingly sensitive and solitary poet whose sole concern was the innermost core of emotion.

This first volume is a story in itself; we are tempted to call it the story of a soul. Its title, which indicates its content, is "Auguste Rodin."

The friendship between the great French sculptor and the German poet belongs to the period from June, 1902, to May, 1906. Rilke, who possessed an unusually deep love and a rarely delicate understanding for plastic art, met Klara Westhof, who later became his wife, when she was a pupil of Rodin's in Paris. Through her he made the acquaintance of the master. Rilke was fascinated by the enormous quantity and variety of Rodin's work, and we may suppose that this enthusiasm also had a personal element. Rainer Maria Rilke, who wrote some of the most beautiful poems in the German language, suffered from a paralyzing fear of work, an almost physical agony of being unable to write. For he wanted nothing that was not perfect. Now there arose before him a demigod who, like a human Creator, worked constantly, disregarding weariness or external disturbances, who was a perfect example of the fact that a man of talent can create an entire world of precious things "'If he works resolutely and with patience'—to

A Breakneck Journey Through Europe

EUROPE IN ZIGZAGS. By Sisley Huddleston, author of "Paris Salons, Cafes, Studios." With 36 illustrations. 354 pp. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. $5.

MR. HUDDLESTON is a journalist of repute and ability, liable to be pitchforked, as journalists are, one moment into politics, the next into economics, the next into sociology. With headquarters in Paris, he dashes off suddenly to Spain or Italy, Germany or Austria or the Balkans, and in all of them he is compelled, at breathlessly short notice, to write of inhabitants and scenery and problems and rush madly with his copy to a cable office, lest an edition of some paper escape him, or to a postoffice, lest the mail train pull out of the railroad station without an article by him.

For years he has been doing this, and the results have been alike entertaining and instructive. But when he gathers together a whole sheaf of his dispatches and articles and seeks to blend them into a book, the result, though it remains instructive and entertaining, is not a thing of unity.

In his book Mr. Huddleston jumps abruptly from subject to subject, usually without an attempt at a bridge between them; it is as staccato as life must seem to him when suddenly routed out of his comfortable Paris bed and shot headlong into the Simplon-Orient Express, with instructions to interview an Austrian personage or elucidate a Balkan crisis. The author himself realizes this—he calls his volume a hotchpotch of personal experiences and impressions, of political speculations and social studies, of travel pictures and portraits of men whom I have for the most part known, in greater or lesser degree, privately or publicly.

In his pages he takes the reader to Spain, where he introduces him to bullfights and Primo de Rivera, beggars, bootblacks and mantillas and celebrities like the late Vicente Blasco Ibáñez and Miguel de Unamuno—that is, the reader is given a glimpse of these two in Mr. Huddleston's Spanish chapter, but not however, on Spanish soil, for, with Primo de Rivera dictator, Blasco Ibáñez found it advisable to live and die on French soil, and Unamuno remains on the safe side of the Franco-Spanish frontier. It was at Mentone that Mr. Huddleston talked with the former, at Paris that he met the latter.

Then he jumps to Italy, where he parades before our eyes the Pope and Mussolini, d'Annunzio and Pirandello, and then—lest the reader settle too deeply into his armchair—he dashes off to Germany—via Austria, Czechoslovakia, Rumania and Yugoslavia! As he races through Austria, with his panting reader in tow, a glimpse is caught of Professor Sigmund Freud; out of Prague, as author and reader flash past it, peep President Masaryk and Karel Capek; Hindenburg and Stresemann and Einstein are descried as Mr. Huddleston pushes and pulls the reader through his chapter on Germany. Then—back to Paris—a General Survey—Minorities—Who Won the War?—Curtain! Whew! One drops the book with an idea that one ought to straighten one's tie and feel one's self all over to see whether limbs are merely bruised or actually broken. For "Europe in Zigzags," under the guidance of Mr. Huddleston, is the maddest sort of a journey!

Mr. Steele's Stories and Other Recent Works of Fiction

TOWER OF SAND AND OTHER STORIES. By Wilbur Daniel Steele. 326 pp. New York: Harper & Bros. $2.50.

THE short stories of Wilbur Daniel Steele have always been notable for their grave and bitter irony, for the sharp symbolism of their plots, for the studied obliqueness of their development. In any form of writing these qualities are excellent servants but extremely bad masters. Where Mr. Steele succeeds in his use of them, the result astonishes and delights his reader by its sheer virtuosity. Where he fails, the failure is more than usually flat. With each successive volume, however, Mr. Steele is becoming more and more expert in the management of his treacherous tools. In the present book his score is higher than ever, for six of the eight stories presented here are unquestionably among the finest he has done.

Only two of the stories are unsatisfactory. In one of them, "A Life," the oblique method is strained to the breaking point. An age so studiously matter-of-fact as ours can hardly be regaled by a story told in the person of a sensitive and articulate sailing vessel which had a picturesque career and observed and recounted a variety of human tragedies. Another story, entitled "Never Anything That Fades," in which the precarious love affair of two adult persons is symbolized by the capricious affection of a small girl for her doll, achieves a ludicrous rather than a subtle effect. The weakness of these stories, however, is more than offset by the brilliance of some of the others.

"Tower of Sand," the title story, is an intricate narrative of a fisherman who, in navigating the waters of the Atlantic Coast, had come upon a dangerous and uncharted shoal. The government department of the Coast and Geodetic Survey refused to credit his assertions, or even to pay him any attention at all. Through brooding constantly upon the matter Standish had become completely obsessed by it. He fought with his best friend over it, and finally withdrew entirely into himself to ruminate upon his wrongs. On a stormy night in a coast radio station, with Standish ill and probably dying, messages are flashed from the distressed ship in the neighborhood of Standish's shoal. Standish rises from bed to stand for hours over the instrument and relay the instructions necessary to guide the ship into safety and deep water. He dies, happy and vindicated, and at peace with his alienated friend, the master of the distressed ship. Afterward it transpires that the harassed Arctic had been safely docked in Boston during the night of the storm.

In "Mary Drake and Will Todd" Mr. Steele has created one of his most impressive characters—a Whitmanesque poet immured in a small New England village, derided as a freak and a failure, legally enjoined from publishing the ridiculous newspaper which had been his only source of income, relying upon the protection of a cool and charitable woman, and existing upon her rather contemptuous hospitality. Daringly enough, Mr. Steele provides his fictitious poet with actual poems, completing the character study and convincing the reader. In "Footsteps," a tense, tightly written story of a blind cobbler, Mr. Steele achieves the finest dramatic effect of the book. Blind Boaz, whose son has robbed and murdered his father's lodger and set fire to the house in order to conceal his work, waits implacably in darkness for the footsteps which will reveal to his trained ear the return of Manuel to the scene of his crime. The suspense is powerfully sustained and the unexpectedly ironic ending is admirably brought off.

FUN AMONG THE SQUIRRELS

MEMORIAL TO GEORGE. By the Author of Miss Tverton Goes Out. Illustrated by James C. Reid. 282 pp. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

LOVERS of animal stories (not necessarily synonymous with animal lovers) will find in "Memorial to George" not only good, clean fun among the squirrels but a great deal of information on squirrel raising. Those who do not like animal stories—and another parenthesis might be used to say that many animal lovers do not like stories about beasts—those who do not like animal stories will be less inclined to get out of patience with this one since in it the animals are given few human emotions, but are left rather to work out their own existence in as natural a way as captivity allows.

The author of the book, one is asked to believe, is George himself, a red squirrel, owned by Her. She edits George's diary and adds those notes on squirrel raising which are not the least interesting feature of the book. Since She desires to be anonymous, one only knows that the book was written by a novelist, presumably a woman, whose other work has been very well received, who has made a vocation of raising squirrels and is competent to discuss the subject from an almost professional point of view. Lest the question be raised, "Who wants a squirrel for a pet, anyway?" she has taken pains to show that the red squirrel, when it is tameable, which is seldom, is the most delightful of companions, repaying with brightness and jollity the attention that is lavished on it.

George is one of the few English red squirrels who lend themselves to captivity. He is a lively and affectionate fellow, with the mating instinct strong in him, though he has great difficulty in finding a mate who will gratify his complementary instinct of nest guarding. Nicolina, the red squirrel who is the love of his life, his "head wife" one might say, never presents him with the babies he wants without knowing it.

The larger part of the narrative, as told by George, deals with the hoarding of nuts (many are hoarded in Her hair, for safekeeping), the "dancing" which every squirrel does at certain times of the year, the making of friends and enemies among the squirrels, of which She has nearly thirty, and the sad facts leading up to these others being taken away, which happens all too often because of the many ills that squirrels in captivity are heir to.

As nearly as a close observer can do, the author has recorded the real reasons for the actions of the pets, rather than the sentimental reasons too fond owners might attribute. The many squirrels who romp through the pages each have individuality, an individuality not only of appearance but of temperment, temper and capacity for showing or receiving affection from other squirrels and humans.

In other words, although the author has seen fit to make George, a squirrel, tell most of the story, she is really telling the reader what she knows about squirrels, which is an experimental knowledge but a real one.

The illustrations, woodcuts of the animals, are a particularly attractive feature of the book.

A PROPAGANDIST NOVEL

VIOLENCE. By Marcet and E. Haldeman-Julius. 374 pp. New York: Simon & Schuster. $2.50.

E. HALDEMAN - JULIUS, the enterprising publisher who distributed literature to our democracy through the medium of a hundred million little blue books, has written, with the collaboration of his wife, Marcet Haldeman-Julius, a novel of the contemporary South. It is, as one might expect from a pair so thoroughly steeped in the spirit of social inquiry, a novel with a purpose—in fact, with several purposes. As one might also expect from such able publicists, it is a fine piece of journalistic writing, in which the story has not been neglected for the demonstration of the thesis. The plot is swift and vigorous, the characterizations, although decidedly two-dimensional, are simple and effective.

No news story ever had a catchier opening than this grave and purposeful novel. "Dr. Philemon K. Jordan, pastor of the First Methodist Church of Rockworth, raised his revolver and fired. The massive man who stood in his study doorway flung up his left arm as if to ward off the shot. * * * Staggering backward into the anteroom in clumsy retreat, he lurched suddenly as three more bullets struck him." Thus Phil Jordan, the personable, eloquent, fire-eating pastor of the largest church in Rockworth, in the State of Texarkana, found himself on trial for murder. He had killed an unarmed man, a henchman of his political enemies, who had come to his study on an errand of intimidation.

A few people in the town disapproved; but the majority, Southern to the core, who still thought in terms of the Southern tradition of personal violence as a means of righting wrongs and maintaining a code of rough justice, not only condoned his action but delighted in it. The weak chorus of dissent was drowned by the popular voice which acclaimed him as "the fighting parson." The defense was framed. Phil, who honestly believed that he had been attacked because of the courage of his crusades, did not mind stretching a point in order to make the spirit of his deed square with the legal definition of a murder committed in self-defense. He was triumphantly acquitted by an enthusiastic jury and found himself and his church more popular than ever.

For contrast to the case of Phil Jordan, that of the young negro, Skip Early, is adduced. Skip, in a moment of frantic terror, murdered a white girl whom he had, technically at least, seduced. His victim was not new to amorous experience. Her first lover had been Dan Jordan, the son of the fighting parson, and together they had fitted up a rendezvous in the belfry of the church. Sue Jean, avid for experience, had introduced other lads to her improvised boudoir, and Skip, the reckless young son of the church janitor, knew perfectly what was afoot. He investigated the belfry, and coming upon Sue Jean alone, he found that his amorous proposals were not very vigorously resisted. Afterward, in a paroxysm of remorse, Sue threatened to tell, and Skip, who knew that he would very likely be burned to death if denounced, murdered her.

In a passion of popular fury, the townspeople mobbed the jail. Cheated of their object by the National Guardsmen, they turned upon a moron negro, an escaped convict whose desperate attempts to obtain food had caused him to assault a farm woman. They lynched him, having refrained from burning him alive because of Phil Jordan's objections, and then dragged his body through the streets to form a funeral pyre in the centre of the town. With the spirit of mob violence thus appeased, Skip Early was brought to trial. He was clearly a murderer, but the circumstances were less black than they appeared, and a fair hearing would certainly have saved him from the extreme penalty of the law. Although several prominent persons interested themselves in Skip's case, no able lawyer could be found to defend him. He was condemned after a perfunctory session and summarily executed. The same creed of violence which had saved Phil Jordan in similar circumstances hounded Skip Early to his death.

In this fashion the Haldeman-Juliuses illustrate their case against the senseless violence of mob rule, against a section of the country which orders its affairs and administers its justice in a manner which the rest of the nation deems uncivilized. "Violence," however, is a novel and not a mere tract. The authors have centred enough interest in the fate of Phil Jordan and Skip Early as individuals to evade the direct charge of preaching.

A FANTASY OF THE FUTURE

THE MAN WHO MASTERED TIME. By Ray Cummings. 351 pp. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. $2.

But science is not concerned with our feelings—and science recognizes today that time is a property of space just as are length, breadth and thickness.

THE Scientific Club of New York is naturally completely startled by so bold a statement, made by one of its youngest members, Loto Rogers. And when the young man further convinces his audience that he has invented a machine, built on the mechanical principle of the airplane—a machine which will make it possible to travel indefinitely through the unexplored realm of time—the proper amount of bewilderment and incredulity is expressed.

Their scepticism rapidly crumbles. For not only is the machine carefully displayed and explained, but a trip in the magical plane actually occurs. It is a magnificent journey. Thousands of years of time are traversed in a few clock hours. Cities spring up and melt away in what appears a dozen seconds. The

THE METROPOLIS OF TOMORROW. By Hugh Ferriss. 144 pp. New York: Ives Washburn. $7.50.

By R. L. DUFFUS

AT the end of 1929 there are in the United States 377 skyscrapers more than twenty stories high, and of these 188, or almost exactly half, are in New York City. Some of them, viewed apart from the masses of buildings amid which they stand, are beautiful. Some express, in vibrant steel, the spirit of the age which produced them. Others are draped in classical order which reveal a confusion in the minds of those who made them and which obscure whatever significance they might have had. But the tendency toward skyscrapers, that is to say, the tendency toward centralization in cities, seems irresistible. Street congestion threatens to take away most of its benefits, but it continues. So far the building of skyscrapers has been the result of blind and groping impulses. They rise incongruously beside structures with which they have no conceivable relationship. They glare at each other like hostile giants. They indicate no scheme or pattern. Obviously, this cannot go on indefinitely. Cities must have patterns or they will fall to pieces of their own weight. Architects must stop thinking in terms of individual buildings. They must begin to think in terms of whole communities. And this is what Hugh Ferriss, already known to laymen for the beauty of his architectural drawings, has tried to do in "The Metropolis of Tomorrow." In this vastly appealing book he has assembled, in text and illustrations, his conceptions of what the builders have done and may do.

He gives us, first, the city of today, in order that we may see what trends are already at work. These trends show themselves in isolated buildings, rarely in groups. We see them in the Telephone Building in St. Louis, with its effective setback profile uncompelled by any zoning ordinance; in the Board of Trade Building in Chicago, with "its strong, ascending mass"; in the Chicago Tribune Building, product of a competition which, ironically enough, brought more fame to Eliel Saarinen, who took second prize, than to the architects who took first; in that bold advertisement in black and gold, the Radiator Building; in the Hotel Shelton, which struck many observers as "uncouth" and "uncivilized" before familiarity made it seem good; in the Los Angeles Municipal Tower; in the Chanin and Chrysler Buildings, going up like young mountains above an already over-crowded intersection, and several others. The common attribute of these structures, whether they resemble towers or whether they are pyramidal, is a certain soaring quality. They lift pigmy humanity out of the streets. Unhappily, humanity cannot yet live permanently in the clouds. Architects are not yet required to provide means by which the populations of tall buildings can travel to and from them.

Another Conception of a Future City—Slim Towers, Well-Spaced, Rising From Wide Avenues.

Two problems, therefore, mingle themselves in Mr. Ferriss's discussion—an esthetic problem and a practical problem. We cannot safely entrust our future to cities which are dangerous and inconvenient nor to cities which outrage some enduring principle in our own human nature. The younger architects are already impatient with buildings which are really not frozen music but frozen lies; as Mr. Ferriss puts it, > they will not continue to misinterpret, for the public's indulgence, the new language of steel; in a building where the load is carried more on the interior than the exterior column, they will not place a façade which states, falsely, that the greatest load is carried on the corners.

If we project present-day tendencies, we arrive at certain possibilities—the multi-decked city, with trafffic five, ten, fifteen or twenty stories above the street; churches and bridges that are also skyscrapers; a city of interminable masses and deep abysses, carved out of the "envelopes" left by zoning regulations; perhaps worse yet, a city in which classical styles are hung almost indecently on modern frameworks; cities of steel and glass; finally, which affords some reason for optimism, cities in which the skyscrapers will be placed at such intervals that they will not crush the people they are meant to express and serve.

So we come to Mr. Ferriss's city of the future, which is not very different in general plan from that envisaged by the Frenchman Le Corbusier. It will resemble "a wide plain, not lacking in vegetation, from which rise at considerable intervals towering mountain peaks." Its monumental edifices will rest on foundations covering three or four city blocks, but they will be half a mile apart, and past them will run avenues at least two hundred feet wide. Unlike Le Corbusier, Mr. Ferriss does not suggest razing the lower buildings, say six stories high, which stand between them. But he would cover these buildings with earth and plant flowers, shrubs and even trees on their roofs. The ground plan of the city of the future would be significant. One of its great mountain towers would be the principal structure of the business centre, another of the science centre, another of the art centre. These would stand at the points of a triangle, set into a circle, which would be the focus of the city, like the plaza of Spanish towns or the village green of New England. From the circle would radiate subsidiary buildings, at proper intervals, in broad bands of avenues and streets. Between these bands, reaching almost to the centre of the metropolis, would be the residential wedges, widening outward. Says Mr. Ferriss:

> Are we to imagine that this city is populated by human beings who value emotion and mind equally with the senses and have therefore disposed their art, science and business centres in such a way that all three would participate equally in the government of the city? This might indeed seem a novel system of government. The plan indicates, at least, that the structures to house these activities exist, and that such a threefold system of government is regarded in this city as at least a potentiality, a potentiality which the citizens, whenever so moved, could actualize.

The main towers of the city of the future would be 1,200 feet high, the others somewhat more stunted. Traffic would be carried on more than one level, but the resulting shadows, if present-day materials were employed, would be avoided by the use of translucent blocks. The use of glass in buildings would probably bring out the horizontal lines of the unclothed steel grill—a human and rather comforting offset to the disquieting effect of height produced by the overemphasis of the vertical line. But Mr. Ferriss's religious centre, miraculously made possible by the cooperation of the hundred warring sects, would soar in organ-like flutings and great pointed arches toward a sky which would still be higher than any human Tower of Babel. Philosophy would soar, too, in a building based on a nine-pointed star. But since philosophers are few and words more feeble than sights and sounds it would be the sum total of the city's buildings that would matter most. For, as Mr. Ferriss puts it:

> Architecture influences the lives of human beings. City dwellers react to the architectural forms and spaces which they encounter; specific consequences may be looked for in their thoughts, feelings and actions. Their response to architecture is usually subconscious. Designers themselves are usually unconscious of the effects which their creations will produce.

Those whose memories go back even a few years into the nineteenth century will feel a sense of strangeness and even of foreboding in the presence of Mr. Ferriss's visions. They are like a heaven of golden streets for those who love best the warm smell and feel of earth in the sun. But that Mr. Ferriss's metropolis, or something less lovely, is in store for us can hardly be denied. Monster cities and monster buildings are already here. They are being built by forces not yet under control. The task is to subdue them to the uses of a creature which cannot forget its native mountains, plains and woods, which still yearns for sunlit open spaces, for the unbroken sweep of sky, for homelinesss and quiet. Mr. Ferriss has contributed something to the fulfillment of that task.

Give them these good books for these good reasons

The student; the historically and politically minded; the lover of good sound reading

Because its thorough portrait and keen analysis of the greatest man of his time have been enthusiastically praised by critical authorities; and because it embodies a rich study of that exciting period when the turbulent young United States first sensed its strength and potentialities. Here is Webster, playing the gallant in Washington and the country gentleman on his manorial acres, but all his fiery heart and brilliant mind engrossed in moulding and driving a government to his far-seeing plans with his matchless oratory.

DANIEL WEBSTER
by ALLAN L. BENSON

The young and old alike; dads and mothers; every home with a bookshelf

Because it is a work of straightforward sincerity, great for its picture of a man and a career, its history of our own times, and above all its fine American philosophy—a penetrating appreciation of the things that happen to all men great or humble. Mr. Coolidge retraces his life from Vermont boyhood to the White House, clarifying mysteries, unraveling complexities, dramatizing the human background of history. Its appeal is all-inclusive; it has been a best seller since publication. For many perplexing places on your gift list, it is the ideal book.

Johnson and Boswell

Johnson Boswell had nursed biographic ambitions, inspired by his acquaintance in Edinburgh and Glasgow with such celebrities as Kames, Blair, Hume, Robertson and Sir David Dalrymple. In the case of the latter these ambitions had even gone as far as a note-taking of the jurist's sayings. Boswell had also long meditated on a life of Kames. Nor after their momentous first meeting in the back room of Davies's bookshop was his desire to earn fame as a biographer confined to Johnson; two months later he had begun collecting anecdotes of John Wilkes, the political agitator, who, in Boswell's eyes, was in some respects more congenial, if less to be reverenced and hearkened to, than the great Cham. Fealty to Johnson, who disliked Wilkes, seems, however, to have won the day, and what might have been a simple incidental life of Johnson became the great monument it is. In paying the work tribute, Mr. Salpeter remarks:

If we accept Macaulay's definition of Boswell as a small man, then the big thing that is "The Life of Johnson" is a miracle, and it is the custom of this age to reject miracles. All knowledge of, all interest in, the literary and social aspects of the Johnsonian period derives from and returns to Boswell, the great source. Without him, the epoch would have lacked the name and the personality it has. It took the American Revolution to prevent our forgetting that George III reigned in Johnson's time. Boswell perfectly fulfilled his destiny and, in fulfilling it, fulfilled another man's, projected Johnson into the ages. "Homer is not more decidedly the first of heroic poets," writes Macaulay, "Shakespeare is not more decidedly the first of dramatics. Demosthenes is not more decidedly the first of orators, than Boswell is the first of biographers. He has no second. He has distanced all his competitors so decidely that it is not worth while to place them. Eclipse is first and the rest nowhere." Discount a little from this, on the assumption of Macaulayan exaggeration, and the "Life" yet remains a great work.

Regarding the influence exerted by one on the other in the "greatest of all literary associations," Mr. Salpeter considers Boswell the more affected. Boswell has a strong wish to be approved of, was constantly adjusting himself to the presumed expectation of others, especially those who were older and estimable. He particularly sought the approval of Johnson, and thus the moralist became an influence for good.

Boswell's spine was in need of stiffening, Mr. Salpeter allows, though he would "not wish Boswell to be other than he was. He defines him as a conveniently religious man whose impulses were inconveniently strong, who fought melancholy with conviviality, lapsed into conduct which his moral side could not allow to pass without reproach and found ever new reasons for melancholia and conviviality. He also shared Johnson's fear of death and there was undoubtedly a dash of fear in his morality * * * Boswell may be regarded as a trumped-up peace between two warring factions in himself.

The view is the traditional one; for the modern reconstruction of Boswell alters him in our eyes only in the intellectual sense, in the matter of his personality. It presents him as "an amateur of human life," to use Professor Walter Raleigh's words, and largely adds to our interest in the private man.

Mr. Salpeter appropriately dedicates his book to A. Edward Newton—"because he, more than any other American, has popularized Samuel Johnson and his biographer."

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

A NUMBER of valuable items of early Americana have been collected by Covici-Friede, and will be issued from time to time in a series of books to be known as the "Roanoke Series of Americana." Mark Van Doren is editing the series and will write an introduction to each volume. The plan is to issue five volumes a year in editions limited to 500 copies. The two volumes now available are "Correspondence of Aaron Burr and His Daughter Theodosia," and "The Life of Sir William Phips. by Cotton Mather. The latter volume is reprinted from the seventeenth-century edition of Mather's "Magnalia Christi Americana" and records the life of a doughty and eccentric Colonial Governor who had an adventurous career.

The latest selection of the Spanish Book Club of Madrid is "Pobre Blanco," a translation of Sherwood Anderson's "Poor White," published here by the Viking Press. Not to be outdone in international courtesy, the Viking Press has just published an English translation of the novel "Roots" by Eduardo Zamacois, one of Spain's leading novelists.

Douglas Cockerell, widely known as a binder of fine editions and the author of the handbook, "Some Notes on Bookbinding," has perfected a new process for the making of marble paper by hand, thus reviving an ancient and beautiful art. The process consists in throwing spots of prepared colors on to a trough of size made from seaweed. The colors floating on the surface of the size are combed in various ways and then picked up on sheets of paper that have been washed in alum water Each sheet is a separate creation calling for skill and taste on the part of the workman. The Oxford University Press will use these papers in the binding of a series of editions of Shakespeare, Shelley, Keats, "The Oxford Book of English verse," and other titles, combining the marble paper with leather especially tanned and dyed to Mr. Cockerell's specifications, and decorated in blind and gold ornaments.

College Translations, whose letterhead bears the appropriate symbol of a galloping pony, announce as their first publication Racine's great tragedy, "Andromache," translated into English prose by Eugene Fontaine. The address of College Translations is P. O. Box 147, Station D, New York City. The officers of the concern are: F. M. Frey, president, and Eugene Fontaine, Editor.

Common Ground Press, 104 Fifth Avenue, New York City, has been organized for the purpose of publishing books which tend to promote religious unity and to combat intolerance. The name of the organization is repeated in its first publication, just issued, "The Common Ground," by Herman Rosenwasser. Dr. Rosenwasser says that "underlying each man's creed there is a foundation on which a temple of righteous living may be built; . . . despite any disparity of creed, we are all striving for the same end." He justifies this belief by tracing the fundamental similarities of the leading religions in the lives of their leaders.

Charles Castre, Professor of American Literature and Civilization in the University of Paris, has written a book entitled "An Introduction to Edwin Arlington Robinson," which is to be published here in the Spring by the Macmillan Company.

The American rights of Knut Hamsun's latest novel have been acquired by Coward-McCann, who will publish the book in the Spring. The title of the book in the original Norwegian is "Landstrykere," which may be translated as "Tramps" or "Vagabonds."

The title of Margaret Widdemer's forthcoming novel, announced for Spring publication by Farrar & Rinehart, is "Loyal Lover"—not "Loyal Ladies," as we stated in this column a week ago.

A new play by Ludwig Lewisohn is announced for publication about the middle of December by Harper & Bros. Under the title "Adam." Mr. Lewisohn has transported the legend of the Wandering Jew into modern times and modern manners. The seven scenes of the play are placed on the Riviera, in an English manor house, a New York office and a village on the borders of Poland.

Louis Untermeyer, who besides being a poet and critic is one of the editors of Paper Books, published by Charles Boni, has sailed for Europe to secure manuscripts for the forthcoming publications of Paper Books. He plans also to form an advisory committee of European men of letters who will recommend books for publication in the Paper Books Club. Mr. Untermeyer expects his trip to last about three months.

Sarah Salt (Mrs. Harold Hobson), whose novel "Sense and Sensuality" was published a short time ago by Payson & Clarke, plans to come to this country early in January for a four weeks' visit. A new novel from her pen will be published while she is here.

Both Achmed Abdullah and T. C. Pakenham, joint authors of "Dreamers of Empire," recently published by Frederick A. Stokes Company, have been officers in the British Army, and each of them has been decorated more than once. Captain Abdullah, however, is on record as having refused a decoration from the King of a Balkan principality. He had been warned that it was inadvisable to play poker with the King or to accept decorations from him. The King was reputed to have unconventional ideas regarding the ethics of poker, and his decorations were bestowed in the form of an order for a cross from the one local jeweler at a price of 5,000 rubles, to be paid by the recipient. Having been forewarned, Abdullah professed total ignorance of all card games and told the King that "as a good Mohammedan" he could not accept a cross.

Muriel Hine, author of "The Ladder of Folly" (D. Appleton & Co.), has discovered that she has ten thousand cousins, more or less removed, in the United States. All of them are descendants of Captain Andrew Newcomb, who sailed in his own ship from Saltfleetby to the Isle of Shoals, Boston, Mass., where he settled and founded a

A Farewell by Ernest

From coast to coast this great story of love in war-time is not only the best-selling novel with hardly a contender for the title, but also the most talked-about novel of the year. "Mr. Hemingway," says The Forum, "has taken two of the oldest themes in the history of literature and has so treated them that they become thoroughly moving even to the most sophisticated."

Sixth large printing

Look Homeward, Angel
by Thomas Wolfe

"Has the good, rich, buoyant health of those roaring Elizabethan tales of Nash and Greene. It breathes the spirit of youth, bawdy, profane, soaring, depressed—but alive and real and full of meaning. Mr. Wolfe . . . has dodged nothing . . . neither life's vulgarity, bestiality, profanity, and horror, nor its fine strivings, its hope and its invincible optimism."
—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

"Vigorously and strikingly written and belongs in the ranks of the best books of the current season."—The New Yorker.

$2.50

to Arms Hemingway

Arnold Bennett in one of the first English reviews of "A Farewell to Arms" calls it "A superb performance. . . . The love story is quite as fine as the war story. . . . The description of the wounding of the hero in a bombardment is as tremendously effective as anything current. In fact, I seriously question whether this description has been equalled. Its dialogue . . . is masterly in reproductive realism. A strange and original book."

family, dying in 1636. Captain Newcomb was a descendant of Hugh le Newcomen, born about 1165, who bore arms in the Third Crusade. And Hugh le Newcomen was Muriel Hine's direct ancestor. The question is whether all these American cousins will buy the books of their kinswoman or whether each of them will expect to receive complimentary copies.

H. I. Brock's book "New York Is Like This," which is being brought out by Dodd, Mead & Co., contains a number of articles which have appeared in the Sunday Magazine section of The New York Times, but it contains also many others which have not previously been printed. The book has more than 100 illustrations by J. W. Golinkin.

Elinor Mordaunt, author of "Too Much Java," has left London for a remote spot in Africa, where letters from New York will take at least six weeks to reach her. Before leaving London Mrs. Mordaunt submitted to her publishers, Payson & Clarke, the first part of a new novel, tentatively titled "These Generations."

The Limited Editions Club is distributing to its members 1,500 copies of a reprinting of the first edition of Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass." The original edition was set in type and printed by Walt Whitman himself in 1855. Copies of that edition are rare and very valuable. The present edition adheres to the size and shape of the first edition, but the paper is Vidalon from France and the type is Estienne, a face used for the first time in America. The book is designed by Frederick Warde, and each copy is signed by him. It is printed at the Printing House of William Edwin Rudge.

Eli Seigel is giving a series of poetry soirees each Wednesday evening at 8:30 at the Arts Studio, 146 West Forty-fourth Street. The meetings are open to the public.

Lesley Frost, who edited "Come Christmas," the anthology of Christmas poetry, songs, stories and carols just published by Coward-McCann, is the daughter of Robert Frost, the poet.

Hamlin Garland, whose new book, "Roadside Meetings," is running serially in the Bookman, is building a house for his daughter, Isabel, in Hollywood, and will make his Winter home in California, retaining his Summer home on the slope of Onteora Mountain in the Catskills. His daughter Constance, who has been commissioned to illustrate the book, also lives in Hollywood. "Roadside Meetings" will be published early next year by the Macmillan Company.

Professor John Livingston Lowes of Harvard, author of "The Road to Xanadu," "Convention and Revolt in Poetry" and "Of Reading Books," all published by Houghton Mifflin Company, is to be the first incumbent of the visiting professorship established at Oxford last year by George Eastman.

"Will Rogers's American Follies," previously announced for publication this Fall by G. P. Putnam's Sons, has been postponed until next Spring. Perhaps the author hopes to catch up with the new follies which appear from day to day. If so, he might as well give up; it can't be done.

A new volume in "Our American Holidays Series," published by Dodd, Mead & Co., is "The Magic of Books," compiled and edited by A. P. Sanford and Robert Haven Schauffler. It contains selections of verse and prose as well as short pageants and plays for Book Week programs.

EIGHT OUTSTANDING BOOKS OF 1929

LAUGHING BOY
by OLIVER LAFARGE

"A first novel of sheer beauty and power." The Forum. "A true story of primitive love, admirably rendered, with that complete mastery over the material which conceals from the reader the profoundly studious extent of the writer's knowledge." Mary Austin $2.50

TWENTIETH CENTURY POETRY
Edited by JOHN DRINKWATER, HENRY SEIDEL CANBY, and WILLIAM ROSE BENET

(12) WOODROW WILSON
Single Combat.

WITH passionate detachment, "the incomparable Bolitho" presents the uncensored lives of twelve of the world's greatest adventurers—twelve men and women who dared to live their dreams. WILLIAM BOLITHO scans the earth for giants—and then, by examining these trail-blazers, home-wreckers and disturbers of the peace, his mind has contrived a technique for adventure itself!

"A very thrilling experience for me . . . I can't remember when I have enjoyed anything more, or with so complete absorption in the author's mind."
—WILLIAM MCFEE.

"On the brilliantly woven thread of his style, he strings the Twelve who seem to him to have, to the fullest degree, realized the career of adventure."
—ARTHUR KROCK, in the New York Times Book Review.

"One of the most gripping and moving books of the season and one of the most vivid contributions to popular historical literature in a generation . . . He warms his picture by the dramatic gifts of a superb and original artist. . . That it will charm, thrill and stimulate some tens of thousands of readers in the next half-year cannot be doubted."
—HARRY ELMER BARNES, in the Evening Telegram.

"Up and read WILL BOLITHO's Twelve Against the Gods, very fascinating reading, and I liked the stories about Christopher Columbus and Isadora Duncan the best of all."
—F. P. A., in the World.

"A magnificent book by the endlessly amazing Bolitho."—ALEXANDER WOOLLCOTT in New Yorker.

CLASS REUNION

A New Novel by FRANZ WERFEL

Deep in the human heart lodges the underlying idea which quickens this novel of the glow and grief of adolescence, and exalts to greatness the story of a murderer who strangely becomes accuser instead of accused.

"Class Reunion is a confirmation of WERFEL's indicated genius . . . eloquent in its humane and understanding beauty."
—WILLIAM BOSKIN, in the Evening Post.

"WERFEL's name has been proposed several times for the Nobel prize in letters. Class Reunion should further that movement."

Latest Works of Fiction

acceleration of the plane increases, and great heat is immediately preceded by great cold. When it comes to rest at last, fifty thousand years have been covered.

No great civilization looms up. On the contrary, the essential conditions of living have grown more primitive. There is warfare then, as there is now. The decadent masters, the Arans, indulge in the most outrageous and voluptuous pleasures. The Bas, who for years had suffered under the tyranny of their rulers, prepare for a final rebellion. In the midst of the great furor Loto arrives, partakes in the battle, and frees Azeea, the gentle captive maiden. He does more than this. He carries her back with him to 1929 A. D., where, without any delay, she becomes his very modest wife.

Built somewhat vaguely about the familiar Wellsian notion, this story of the exploration of Time has none of the Wellsian implications. But there is a certain delicious quality in the book, a quality which is the result of its very ingenuousness. Though the most alluring possibilities of such an adventure remain untouched, there are indications that "The Man Who Mastered Time" was not altogether unimaginatively conceived. There is an elaborate description of the Scientist Group, who oppose the tactics of the king and exert an insidious influence over the people by the power which is hidden in their esoteric wisdom. A visit into the workshops of the Scientists reveals a curious collection of inventions of surgical and medical apparatus, partially successful attempts to create man, and, finally, instruments for taking voices and images from the air, regardless of the distance. When a furious battle occurs, the weapons used are small globes that emit a series of currents which instantly electrocute the victim.

The naiveté of the plot and its development, combined with the author's passionate anxiety to reiterate his conviction that, "theoretically," a visit into Time is by no means impossible, makes "The Man Who Mastered Time" frequently very diverting reading.

EXCHANGED IDENTITIES

YESTERDAY'S TOMORROW. By Olive Wadsley. 288 pp. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.

"YESTERDAY'S TOMORROW" deals with the lives of a group of modern people, in London, in the hunting field, in great halls, on moonlit terraces. The opening pages are dramatic.

In a stuffy cabin, steaming for the land they once called home, two outcast wanderers face each other. For ten years, under assumed names, they have been companions, struggling and suffering in dark wild places, sharing their hardships and triumphs, stanch in their friendship. Jim is dying. He cannot reach England and enter into his own—the day he slaved and waited for came too late. Tim knows that to land under his own name, Erskine of Kyle, means certain imprisonment for a crime he has not committed, but nostalgia for at least a glimpse of his native shore proves too strong. In his final moments Jim exacts a promise from his friend to impersonate him, take up his inheritance and keep the estate from his scoundrel brother, Malincourt.

So, as Lord Crane, Tim returns, to "carry on" for Jim, to live down Jim's reputation as a coward and a cheat; Tim who instinctively does the decent thing, who does not know what fear is. There is a marked physical resemblance between the two; ten years and a broken nose might have accounted for the change. The fraud is not suspected. "Old Court" and the tenants are saved but Jim had "let him down." Jim had omitted to mention his wife Lil; he did not know of his son Mickey. To further complicate the plot, there is the deep and pure love of Tim and Diana Landsdale, who until his advent had viewed life "merely as another form of sport * * * her few codes and standards those dealing with playing the game, never lying, never funking, riding dead straight." The dilemma of whether it is more expedient to break his word of honor to the friend who is dead or continue to live a lie, forms Tim's problem and the major substance of "Yesterday's Tomorrow."

Olive Wadsley writes with knowledge of places and people, and therefore makes them convincing, although at times the story verges on melodrama. Her style is restrained yet fluent, and the book deserves the amount of popularity usually attained by this type of sentimental novel.

STORIES BY MR. HAMILTON

THE LITTLE GOLD RING. By Cosmo Hamilton. 382 pp. New York: London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

ARTISTS, actors and writers such as God never made, but such as every romantic person likes to imagine them, people this collection of the short stories of Cosmo Hamilton, reprinted from their first appearance in the popular magazines. All of the stories deal with love and the difficulties of marriage. All of the stories have an ending that is happy to some important person in the story. None of the stories give the reader anything serious to think about, and all are fairly amusing.

There is, for instance, the story of the man whose wife is too interested in a gigolo; so he hires an actress to come home with him and start up a little family jealousy. The man talks just as a playwright would if he were a playwright in a play written by a poor dramatist, and the actress talks just as an actress would in the same play. Things turn out just as the reader knows they are going to, for what could happen but that the gigolo and the actress should go off with each other, leaving the husband and wife reconciled once again?

Then there is the story about the aging actor who is lured by fan mail to go out to the country with his admirer, only to discover that she is not admiring him for himself, but because she wants to get her young man a producer. Mr. Hamilton liked this idea so well that he used it twice, again in the story of an also middle-aged author who is vamped by a sweet young thing who wants to help her reporter fiancé get a scoop. The unfortunate similarity between the two stories is made the more lamentable by their juxtaposition in the book.

"Preserved for Posterity" is the story of a middle-aged artist who has difficulties in avoiding the attentions of a flapper who hero-worships him into distraction. He is only saved when her fiancé, realizing that she must have romance, dresses up like Bill' Hart (or maybe it's Harry Carey) and carries her off on the very verge of her elopement with the unwilling artist.

"Jane's Young Man" recounts the adventures of a young writer who pretends to be a chauffeur and falls in love with a girl who isn't pretending to be a lady's maid but really is one, giving the reader the only surprise in the whole book. But even this surprise is softened, because she isn't a cockneyish lady's maid but is a real lady in spite of her job.

So the stories go. There is hardly a character who is not home loving and respectable, albeit involved in adventures that are fantastic in the extreme. Conversation among these artists, writers and actors is gran-liloquent. They say not the things they would have said, but the things they might wish they had said.

HUNTING IN POLAND

THE SABLE AND THE GIRL. By Joseph Weyssenhoff. Translated from the Original Polish by Kate Zuk-Skarszewska. 307 pp. New York: Poland Book Department. $2.50.

WITHHELD from translation into English for a good many years, because it was felt that the subject matter of "The Sable and the Girl" was so closely allied to Poland that English or American readers would not be able to appreciate it, this book, which was written before the war, has finally found its way into an American edition. The appeal is made universal through a universal sport, hunting and if American sportsmen who read the book grind their teeth in anger over the wanton way in which game is slaughtered in Lithuania and Poland, they will also grind their teeth in envy for the quantity and variety of game there is to slaughter. Teeth grinding being a positive reaction in any case, the book should "take" for the lover of the chase.

The title is taken from the words of an old folksong, which Michael and his friend Stanislas sing before going out together for game:

Hare and deer be thy guerdon,
Mine the sable and the maiden,
Heyday, comrade mine.

"There will be no sable, and the girl I don't want," says Michael, a prophecy which is at least 50 per cent true, as later events indicate.

Michael is attracted to Varshulka, a Lithuanian peasant girl in his friend's employ. The girl, for her

Bares the Heart and Mind of Womanhood in

A GALLERY OF WOMEN

The power of An American Tragedy blazes forth in this book of the strange and lovely women who colored one man's life. And more—for in this book Dreiser, with his deep insight, his compassion and profound sensitivity, plumbs the deeps of these women's souls.

A gallery of women—all different types, all reacting differently to the drama of their lives. Here are women in love and passion, jealousy and ambition, hate and despair.

With these two full, rich volumes, Dreiser again adds a treasure to literature, and reveals woman as has never been done before.

part, is deeply in love with him. But he is a noble and she a peasant, the old, old story, and although many nobles are mixing their blood with that of good peasant stock, Michael is not quite ready to make this concession. Neither does he betray the girl, however, as nobles are wont to do in more fanciful or in ultra-realistic novels. He behaves quite as an honest young fellow should under the circumstances, tells her their love can never be, and sends her off to marry the young peasant who is courting her.

So much for the love story, which runs a weak second to the hunting interests of the book. For when Michael is not making love, which he does about every fourth chapter, he is hunting, wolf or boar or woodcock or ptarmigan or duck or pheasant or any of the countless other game that inhabits the forests and fields of Polish Lithuania. Game there is in such abundance that birds are killed by the hundreds in a few hours, for the sheer joy of killing.

The novel is part and parcel of the country it portrays, a loving and a glowing picture of a land about which little is known to English readers.

MORE TARZAN ADVENTURES

TARZAN AND THE LOST EMPIRE. By Edgar Rice Burroughs. Frontispiece by A. W. Sperry. 313 pp. New York: Metropolitan Books. $2.

TARZAN OF THE APES seems to have become such a well-rooted figure in modern fiction that his admirers can expect to see him in continuous action for many years to come. That his admirers are many and world-wide is indicated by the publishers' blurb on the jacket of this new novel, which proudly declares that 7,000,000 copies of the Tarzan books have been sold in the American and British editions alone and that they have been translated into sixteen languages, including, besides the usual and also some unusual European tongues, Arabic and Hindustani. In this new tale Tarzan's daring adventuresomeness takes him into a hidden region in Africa surrounded by a high mountain wall, where he finds a lost section of the ancient Roman Empire, in which, cut off for a thousand years or more from all the rest of the world, have lived the descendants of one of Caesar's legions and carried on the customs, the traditions and the language of Rome. It is a double-barreled story, for Tarzan attempts to penetrate this region, feared by all the black tribes far and near, in the hope of rescuing a young archaeologist whose father fears he has gone into it; and so the reader follows the adventures and perils and experiences of the two white modern men in this forgotten land where neither knows that the other is there and who do not finally meet until the end of the tale. Alternate chapters take the reader from one to the other, so that the interest and suspense are intensified and given a double edge. It is a typical Tarzan story, wholly without literary merit, and depending for its attraction solely on the gripping quality of its adventures.

A COLLEGE STORY

THE UNWILLING GOD. By Percy Marks. 338 pp. New York: Harper & Bros. $2.50.

PERCY MARKS, who won attention with "The Plastic Age" several years ago and who showed himself a writer of some ability in subsequent books, has not done so well in "The Unwilling God." "The most considerable achievement in the prose fiction of our time is 'The Forsyte Saga' with 'A Modern Comedy.' It is a good story well told."
—William Lyon Phelps.

"Without parallel in English fiction as a study of manners. . . . The reader lays it aside with the knowledge that he has lived and marched with one of the great fictions of literature, a truly stupendous and astounding work." —Percy Hutchison in the New York Times Book Review.

A Galsworthy Gift Suggestion

"A Modern Comedy" "The Forsyte Saga"
"Caravan" (short stories) "Plays"
In attractive box. $10.00

The appeal of "A Modern Comedy" is as wide as life itself. In its almost 800 pages are humor, satire, passion, drama, and sympathetic understanding. The picture of post-war society in England as shown through the lives of the younger Forsytes is unequalled in its sweep and power, and the interest of the narrative itself holds the reader to the end.

For every one who has read "The Forsyte Saga" the new volume is indispensable as the conclusion of the Forsyte family history; and readers who here meet the Forsytes for the first time may read "A Modern Comedy" by itself with complete understanding and fascination.

Contains "The White Monkey," "The Silver Spoon," "Swan Song," and "Two Forsyte Interludes."

recognizes and comments upon the melodramatic qualities of the clinch does not help matters a bit.

Bill Royce comes to college to study. He is older than the average freshman. He has had to work for his living and is working for his education. He loves football at which he is a star player, but does not intend to devote time to it other than as a recreation. Because of his abilities, however, he is urged to join the team, only complying when he is paid to play, thus being justified in giving time to the game which he would otherwise have to spend working. He refuses to join a fraternity because he wants to study. He refuses class offices, and when he proves an unwilling god he is hated and ostracized.

So far, so good. This is conceivably what would happen in such a case. But there is a girl. She refuses to marry Bill because he doesn't play the game for the game's sake. Then the big game comes, he sees the light, and plays football as if he enjoyed playing instead of regarding it as a business. Overnight he becomes a hero who enjoys his worshipers. Bill has learned that it pays to believe in college loyalties, in hero worship and in irresponsible gayety. In short, Bill learns that he should not have neglected the sweetness of companionship. He learns that there is joy in just playing the game. And he wins the girl.

Until the end one is rather interested in Bill's case. His is a real problem. One is interested in his love affair, even though it is obviously fiction, but the conclusion that college is all the stickily sweet things Bill's favorite professor says it is doesn't quite go down.

THE MISSING CERTIFICATE

AROUND THE WORLD. By George Weston. 347 pp. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.

MR. WESTON has been called a "popular" novelist. It would not be too great a strain on critical charity to remove the quotation marks surrounding the epithet and to supply the qualifying adverb "deservedly." For in this story of a young girl of distinguished parentage, whose antecedents have been obscured by her father's nomadic life and early death, trying to establish her right to the family millions in an eventful 'round-the-world search for a missing marriage certificate, there is a pleasant complexity of incident, set forth in only the more palatable of the clichés customary with romantic writers.

And when, at length, the certificate is found—you would never guess where—in the last chapter, and Miss Celia Van Heusen marries the man of her choice, who for love of her had early abandoned his status as a private detective, hired by rival heirs to observe her as a fellow-passenger on the world cruise, one feels quite recompensed for passing an evening in the perusal of what, in many respects, is merely a delicious elaboration of a travel-agency brochure.

SUSPENDING DEATH

THE LAST ENEMY. By Iris Barry. 320 pp. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

THERE lurks in Miss Barry's novel an irresistible idea. Specifically, it is this: How terrifying to man, and how dangerous to the innumerable established mores and activities of society, would be the sudden cessation of death. As a theme, it presents immense possibilities, just because of the elements of the absurd and the incredible which are necessarily mingled with the concept. And since the book might have proved exceedingly piquant, it is quite unforgivable that Miss Barry's efforts

Casanova

her "Mlle. X. C. V." But he was reckoning without the Casanovists. The episode was first linked with a passage in the Memoirs about an earlier visit to Paris in 1751, where he wrote: "I had the opportunity also to meet, at M. de Mocenigo's a Venetian lady, widow of Sir Wynne, an Englishman. * * * With her was her eldest daughter, a young girl, 12 years of age, who despite her youth, already showed every sign of perfection upon her beautiful face."

Research into the archives of the Bastile brought more confirmation, along with the real name of the young girl, Giustiniana Wynne, and then, some three or four years ago, Dr. Bruno Brunelli chanced upon a manuscript in which an anonymous copyist of the late eighteenth century had collected a great many letters from Giustiniana to her lover Andrea, and these indirectly bear out Casanova's story. They do not wholly do so, because for some strange reason she never let her lover know of their child, whom she herself abandoned, but enough is there to bear witness to Casanova's veracity.

These letters give a fascinating picture of a typical demi-mondaine of the eighteenth century. Giustiniana's father was noble, but her mother was not. The scandal of Paris days, her many lovers, her gambling propensities, made her not quite acceptable to the best society of her time, easy going though it was. She lived a gay and adventurous life, but always with that tug at her heartstrings for Andrea Memmo, to whom she wrote almost daily letters full of love.

For him she was just one of many conquests, and on her eventual return to Venice she found him enamoured of another beauty, and at last consented to marry one of the many old men who had fallen madly in love with her. He was Count Filippo Orsini Rosenberg, Austrian Ambassador to Venice, of an ancient and noble family. His relatives never forgave either him or the Countess after his death. She lived to the age of 54, dying respected, admired and loved, after having preached morality in her writings, and achieved respectability in her life.

This full canvas of Giustiniana's life and times was built out of far more research than the mere discovery of the letters. Dr. Brunelli has done a thorough work of scholarship.

Casanova does not fill more than a small portion of his pages, despite the title. To be sure, he kept in touch with Giustiniana throughout her life, but he was always discretion itself. And, after all, she was only one of innumerable mistresses.

Latest Works of Fiction

should have fallen so short of their promise.

Of sensationalism, there is plenty in "The Last Enemy." It is the sensationalism of the tabloid, unmitigated by humor, untouched by poetry, and quite free of those philosophical and social implications which could have whipped up the tale into a furious and splendid satire.

It is to be expected that the realization that deaths are no longer occurring should create a furor in the English village where the action takes place. But there is a most unnatural amount of weeping, mutual consolation, despair and suicide. This reaction comes with such rapidity and with such self-conscious articulateness that it conveys the assumption that the villagers are really aware of the deeper significance of the catastrophe.

It is so easy to question Miss Barry's economics that it would be invidious to do so. Besides, it is quite permissible for her to play havoc with theories. Less difficult to pardon is her graceless treatment of a subject so rare and so tempting.

"This is Stark Young's third distinguished novel. Each one has shown definite growth, and in 'River House' he has reached his full stride. . . . It is a fascinating picture of Southern life, a novel of first rank, a mature and civilized book."

FOR THE DEFENCE

THE LIFE OF SIR EDWARD MARSHALL HALL

By Edward Marjoribanks Second Printing

"Of Intense Human Interest"

"IT ISN'T OFTEN that a reviewer—especially in the fall season—closes a book with regret . . . I struck one in Edward Marjoribanks' For the Defence, the life of Sir Edward Marshall Hall, one of the most brilliant criminal lawyers England has ever had. The book . . . is worth fifty detective novels—even good ones. And although I am pressed for time, I didn't give a hoot and holler how long I had to stay with For the Defence to finish it, and I closed the book with regret that there wasn't more . . . It is, besides, the remarkable portrait of a remarkable man."—WALTER YUST, Philadelphia Ledger.

LORD LANSDOWNE

A Biography by Lord Newton

"Not merely interesting, it is readable; and it becomes more so as it proceeds. It was difficult to make an exciting story out of Lansdowne's admirable but not very eventful tenures of the Viceroyalities of Canada and India. But with the South African War the tale begins to have the interest of controversy as well as that of importance; and both interests go on increasing right up to the affair of the Letter . . . No one who takes an interest in English politics of 1870-1920 can fail to enjoy it."—The London Times

Conquering Dollars

THE IMPERIAL DOLLAR. By Hiram Motherwell. 312 pp. New York: Brentano's. $3.50.

By WILLIAM MacDONALD

MR. MOTHERWELL writes confidently and, on the whole, with enthusiasm about the American dollar, although he prefers to insist upon some important definitions and distinctions in examining the imperialism which the dollar symbolizes. The American "empire" which was built up after the war with Spain was not, he declares, the work of imperialists. "It was the work of the machine, grinding out wealth in a frenzy of newly discovered vigor." The nation itself was not aware of what was going on, for it had not yet made, in its own mind, the transition from an old order to a new. Presumably it has not made the transition completely even now, since, if it had, Mr. Motherwell's book might have taken another form.

Until the end of the last century, we are reminded, American foreign policy had developed in harmony with the conditions of a debtor nation, and a debtor nation cannot very well be imperialistic. Isolation, freedom of the seas, reciprocity, the Monroe Doctrine, unrestricted immigration, the open door in trade—these were the policies that dominated American relations with the rest of the world in the hundred years of what may now be called the old régime. The change came with the Spanish-American War and the acquisition of Hawaii and other overseas possessions. Some of the old shiboleths remained, to be brought out on occasion as reminders of what the past had been and of what some would like the present to be, but the newer interest was obviously in trade expansion, intervention in weaker foreign countries for the protection of American investments and the prevention of revolution, and an eager struggle for the control of raw materials.

The World War brought back to America a huge volume of foreign-held securities, and before long the United States was financing the Allies to the tune of billions and discovering "a creditor's interest in preserving the solvency of its debtors." Along with the vast extension of credit went an unprecedented expansion of industry, and before the war ended the United States was possessing itself of former European markets, particularly in Latin America. American industry, American trade and the American dollar were in control, and the control was exercised all the more easily because the war, while it added little to the aggregate wealth of the country, centralized profits in comparatively few hands.

Mr. Motherwell refers with caution to the alleged action of the Federal Reserve Board in anticipating and hastening the "inevitable world deflation" after the war. If, however, the board did what "there seems to be evidence" that it did "before the price level had become still more fantastic," he concludes that it "performed a statesmanlike service for the world and demonstrated America's power to control international events." He sees the United States dictating before long "the imperial Dawes plan," and notes that the principal agent in the affair was not a politician but a banker.

By 1925, then, the United States, "had experienced the sensation of imperial power, and had made her principal adjustments to the post-war world"—adjustments which "involved an almost thorough revision or scrapping of her traditional policies." Of the old policies, that of the high tariff appears to Mr. Motherwell to be the only one that has "persisted unimpaired." We have scrapped isolation "entirely," scrapped reciprocity "as a principle" but retained it "as a convenience," scrapped free immigration, "retained and greatly enlarged" the Monroe Doctrine, retained the open door "with reservations in those territories covered by the Monroe Doctrine" and "vigorously insisted" upon it elsewhere, and scrapped the freedom of the seas "in reality" although "no test case has arisen since the World War."

What, however, is empire? It is not, as Mr. Motherwell sees it, "assimilation, or control of legislation, or imposition of tribute or taxes, or tariff privileges or reciprocity, or military obligation, or even control of foreign policy." The "common denominator" of this variety is "the power, effective or potential, of one nation over another nation or community." The substance of imperialism is "not one-sided authority but mutual advantage, based upon the actual balance of give-and-take between the two nations." Imperialism must establish an equilibrium, and for that reason Mr. Motherwell finds the imperial mind "more humane than the nationalist mind." "The characteristic of national sovereignty is the power to declare war. The characteristic of imperial sovereignty is the power to impose peace."

Looked at from this point of view, Mr. Motherwell sees a beneficent American imperialism permeating the world through the agency of the dollar. South America is "coming into imperial relations with the United States"; American branch plants are multiplying in Europe. It is possible that the Federal Reserve Board has the power to "control or heavily influence the world's price level," and American influence may some day be "decisive in preventing another European war." All that the nation hath will it give to protect that dollar which it has set at work for the benefit of mankind as well as of itself.

Mr. Motherwell is sure that America has this kind of an empire. He is not so sure that it has an imperial policy. It has "a broad and consistent commercial policy," which is "to force the export of American goods to the utmost without lowering the American tariff," but "the interests which America is defending today are not those of a dollar here and a dollar there, but of billions of dollars." Hence the need, which Mr. Motherwell seems confident America will realize, of promoting prosperity and preventing war everywhere.

There is, of course, no lack of illustrations, and Mr. Motherwell's experience as a journalist enables him to make good use of such as support his thesis. American customs are spreading in Europe, from the cocktail to the movie. "It is not a fact that America is universally feared and disliked in Europe"; on the contrary, "vast portions of Europe's population look on America not as a menace but as a hope." What is feared is the influence of America in "stimulating class war in Europe"—an influence which Mr. Motherwell brackets with that of Bolshevism in threatening the authority of the ruling classes over the mass of people.

Mr. Motherwell is not blind to the dangers, but he does not spend much time in discussing them. The day will come, in ten or perhaps fifty years, when America, instead of "lending abroad more money than it receives as interest on previous loans," will find the process reversed and "be due to receive more each year than she lends." It will then have to face "some measure of commercial defense against the products in Europe."

There is one curious anomaly in Mr. Motherwell's interesting book. That is the inclusion in some appended notes of the withering account of American dealings with Haiti contained in Nearing and Freeman's book entitled "Dollar Diplomacy." A good many readers will be likely to conclude that if Haiti is a fair illustration of the attitude of the American Government toward weaker peoples, the onward march of American dollar imperialism is something to be dreaded, and that the danger of a Pan-European combination against America may become very real.

Foreign Relations

SURVEY OF AMERICAN FOREIGN RELATIONS, 1929. Prepared under the direction of Charles P. Howland. Council on Foreign Relations series. 535 pp. New Haven: Yale University Press. $5.

By JOHN B. WHITTON

CRITICS of our foreign policy too often take position at opposite extremes, both equally undiscriminating, both equally indefensible. Our expansion in Central America, for example, is to some an execrable form of dollar diplomacy and to others an admirable expression of the big-brother spirit. A sense of measure—which, according to many observers, is not an American virtue—would compel us to take a middle course. There are both good and bad in our foreign policy, and both must be exposed impartially if the critic is to play a beneficial rôle. It is in this objective spirit that the Council of Foreign Relations has undertaken to publish, each year, a survey of American foreign relations. The second in the series, which has just appeared, is a remarkably valuable work. A number of the most vital problems of our foreign policy are thoroughly examined, the facts set forth with admirable detachment.

The present volume provides us with a comprehensive survey of our Caribbean relations, both in general and in particular, and gives special attention to the implications of the moral responsibility assumed by us in the countries north of the Panama Canal. The question of immigration, particularly its international complications, is reviewed in detail, and the new problems considered which arise from the enforcement of the national origins provision. Finally, we find a record of the evolution of the World Court and the Pact of Paris, with special emphasis upon our own relation to these means toward world peace.

Two parts of the book deserve particular mention. The first is a chapter analyzing the basic reasons for our Caribbean policy. There follows a review of our action in Cuba, Santo Domingo, Haiti, Nicaragua, Panama, Costa Rica, Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala—a compact and authoritative summary of the essential facts. Commenting upon these facts, the final chapter in this section makes a brilliant analysis of the fundamental causes—strategic, economic, political and juridical—which underlie our Central American activities.

There are certain vital weaknesses in the case for American interference in the Caribbean, despite the obvious benefits which it has brought to the countries of that region. The survey is confined largely to the facts, but the facts themselves demonstrate the defects in our position. The case of Nicaragua is typical. We have attempted to justify our intervention in that country on the ground that it was required for the protection of American lives and property. But, as this survey shows, these had been respected by both sides in the insurrection when we interfered. In this matter, moreover, our establishing great neutral zones went far beyond the necessities of the case. It should be added, also, that the claim that we intervened because requested by both parties to do so is not borne out by the facts: Our intervention entered its most active phase in January 1927, but the acceptance of American interposition by both parties did not occur until several months thereafter. Authors suggest, however, that in certain circumstances a higher moral law may permit intervention even when international law would not authorize it. Such a case would arise when outside interference is required to end a state of chronic anarchy. But if this be the motive for our interposition, and we are sincere in our assumption of the "big brother" rôle, we are under an implied duty of trusteeship, which would require us to prepare the natives for self-government and independence. But we have neglected one of the essential obligations of such a trusteeship: the adequate education of the natives. Even in Haiti, where we have stayed longer than in most countries which we have entered, while our occupation has been beneficial in many ways, the educational program has been inadequate. In other respects, also, our administration in Haiti and elsewhere has been deficient and unsatisfactory. This is due in part to our inability to understand the Latin-American's psychology and his way of living, and partly to duplication of effort. One is astounded to learn that our administration in the Canal Zone is under the authority of the War Department, in the Virgin Islands of the Navy Department, that Santo Domingo customs are controlled by the Bureau of Insular Affairs and that Haiti and Nicaragua are under the authority of the State Department!

"Our administration, furthermore, cannot be satisfactory so long as our tenure is uncertain; after intervening, we are afraid to stay in, not only because we always proclaim that our occupation is but temporary, but also because we fear the bitter opposition, with the cries of 'imperialism,' which is bound to arise at home and abroad. At the same time, we fear to get out, because the little State, left to its own resources, may relapse into anarchy, menace American investments which have grown to huge proportions, and constitute a danger, perhaps, to the Monroe Doctrine or the defenses of the canal! Finally, even if our tutelage were wholly disinterested and entirely efficient, this would not calm the fears of other States, for 'an alien self-appointed guardian cannot escape suspicion and misunderstanding.'" This may be a hint from the authors that the solution lies in some form of collective action. At all events, the self-assumed task of the United States in the Caribbean is no easy one, and > needs to be accompanied by the reflection that a relation in which the self-interested stronger party is trustee for the interests of the weaker contains the seeds of discord, and for its successful discharge requires a choice of coordinated means in administration, an elastic opportunism in procedure, and a frequent and skeptical scrutiny of the results.

The second part of the book which merits special praise deals with immigration. American policy from the beginning to the World War is summarized, the literacy test and 1917 act discussed, and the acts of 1921, 1922 and 1924 considered, along with their resulting problems. Students of foreign relations will be most interested in the chapter on Oriental exclusion and that devoted to the international implications of the immigration question. The most instructive and brilliant chapters, however, discuss, with scholarly detachment and skill, the economic aspects of restriction and the arguments for and against ethnic discrimination.

Dr. Leverett S. Lyon of the Brookings Institution is the author of "Hand-to-Mouth Buying," a study of the buying habits of American business, which is the December selection of the Business Book League, 160 Fifth Avenue, New York City. The book discusses the trend of purchasing in various typical industries such as iron and steel, textiles, canning, clothing, &c. Other books included in the league's recommendations for December are "Myron T. Herrick: Business—Politics—Diplomacy," by Colonel T. Bentley Mott; "The Passing of Normalcy," by Charles W. Wood; "Coxey's Army: A Study in Industrial Unrest," by Donald L. McMurry, and "The Manufacturer and His Outlets," by Chester E. Haring.

Following the trail blazed by the great Darwin, G. ELLIOT SMITH presents

HUMAN HISTORY

WHAT is Man? For thousands of years this question was left to the speculations of priests and philosophers. Only in 1859 did the great Darwin blaze the trail for the scientific answer. Anthropologists and psychologists have followed in his path. And now, in 1929, another great student of Man tells us what is known today of Man's nature and his history—of his unchanging psychology—of his colossal creation of civilization. The result is a story never told before: HUMAN HISTORY, a book that reads like a fascinating novel, whose hero is Man.

Just published—give HUMAN HISTORY for Christmas. 488 pages, with many illustrations, $5.00.

Memories of France

THE HOUSE OF MEMORIES. By Barbara Wilson. 216 pp. New York: Lincoln MacVeagh, The Dial Press. $3.

By KATHERINE WOODS

THE "house of memories" of which Lady Wilson writes is a girlhood in France. But if the happenings of that girlhood took place some thirty years ago, memory has been strengthened, and its house added to, by continuing acquaintance with France and the French people. This is a book which combines, with a richness as unusual as it is delightful, personal memoirs with keen comment upon the life and customs of another nation.

The latter feature is naturally the more important, not only because the author has observed keenly, studied impartially and expressed herself with clarity and charm, but because the French world in which she lived is that closed universe of the old aristocracy which so few foreigners have ever entered, and which is so little known in other lands. This is not to say that "Mademoiselle Barbara" and her family knew only aristocrats; on the contrary, the men, women and children who appear in "The House of Memories" come from all classes socially, and from different intellectual and artistic groups. But the aristocratic French Lady Wilson does know, and has known all her life. They are markedly different from other French people. We see and enjoy the breadth of Lady Wilson's knowledge when she writes about France, and she has given us a remarkably rich portrait gallery in a little space. In one chapter, for instance, she is the guest of the Duc and Duchesse de Tremoïle at the Château de Serrant on the Loire; in another she is visiting the family of her governess, and seeing through their eyes a little tragedy of French life and immemorial convention.

"The House of Memories" is written with something of the elegance and wit which the author knows so well in French conversation as well as in French literature. For the most part it is a quiet book, sympathetic, observant, rich with the tolerance of a woman of the world, and the appreciation that only a keen and imaginative mind can bestow; but here and there are quick strokes of sparkling brilliance, comments that spring from, and sum up, lifelong understanding. The picture of the salon of the Comtesse de C. is one of these brilliant flashes—the simple lunch, which, "as is inevitable in France, was commented on by everybody," and then the gathering of the guests, with their epigrammatic talk and their jealous tempers, old men all: "they were brilliant men who had done little with their lives but say witty things, and that is a difficult way of spending a longish lifetime." The whole scene is delightful, and the later portrait of the Comtesse, a very different figure on a château terrace in Anjou, is most interesting. The author passes from that to comment upon French women and their position generally:

> Her courage and clear vision—a certain brilliant hardness, a diamond quality of her intellect catching the rays of light and giving them back in the crude colors of the prism—had blinded me to other gifts. I began to realize, later, that this acute perception, this fearless vision, are the highest manifestations of the feminine mind, and that it is through these qualities that woman has secured for herself in France a place different from anything that her sentimental gropings have achieved for her in England. * * * A sense of true values has produced the long roll-call of the splendid women of France.

And along with this should be read a sentence from a girl's observation of her French schoolmates: "The young ladies who attended the Cours with us were head and shoulders above us in every subject—molten by that white heat of learning which enables a girl in France to obtain her baccalauréat, or at least the Brevet Supérieur, at the age of sixteen."

French thoroughness, clarity, passion for truth and pride in good work, whether seen in the Faubourg St. Germain, in the studio of a famous artist or in the soul of a midinette, are shown forth again and again in this delightfully readable book. There is a significant sentence, too, upon French courtesy, one of the best brief comments on that subject that I have ever seen: "The French score socially by an entire absence of self-consciousness." And then, further along on the same page, explaining the falseness of the Anglo-Saxon idea of the French as an "artificial" people: "One of the key-qualities of French character is that of simplicity of which greatness is largely composed."

These are some of the observations in a book which is essentially a book of observation, never of indiscriminate praise—in that connection may be mentioned the keen and amusing notation on the tolerance and self-sufficiency of the French "live-and-let-live" attitude. As personal memoirs, Lady Wilson's record is no less enjoyable than her commentary is pertinent.

As memoirs, indeed, "The House of Memory" is remarkable for its restraint, its objectivity, its complete lack of egotism. The granddaughter of Sir Charles Tennant, the niece of Reginald Lister, First Secretary and later Counselor of the British Embassy in Paris, "Mademoiselle Barbara" may be rightly described as "knowing everybody" and "going everywhere." She presents a few telling pictures of great personalities in the Paris of the last quarter of the nineteenth century; she gives a few gay glimpses of her life as a Paris débutante, following her more fully recounted schoolgirl days; she combines personal narrative with social comment in the charming story of a visit to a certain great lady in Passy. But throughout her book she never obtrudes the personal note, never presents a superfluous detail about herself or her family. And just as she tells the story of a shopgirl's sad little romance with the same sympathy which, in another chapter, pictures the personality of the Royalist Edouard Bocher, so she enters, herself, into the life about her, and writes, not of herself, but of it.

The result is a book of unusual quality in its penetration and its charm.

Van Buren

trimmed before the storm. Van Buren only fought the harder, won his fight, and lost the election of 1840 and a second term in the White House. It is generally assumed that in that campaign the country, for no reason, suddenly went crazy over log cabins and hard cider, but those were only the outward symbols; it was the panic, and Van Buren's intrepid fiscal fight, that elected Harrison, as they would have elected any other anti-Van Buren man. In 1837, as in 1840, 1844 and 1848, Van Buren appears more the lion than the little "Red Fox."

Mr. Lynch's method is that of a serious biographer and historian. He does not seek dramatic effect, but the dramatic effect of such a story cannot be lessened by his multitudinous detail and careful research. He wishes you to understand that his book is as much a history of the times as a life of Van Buren, and it is true that one does get a good idea of the times because of the immensity of his examination and the range it takes. Still, it is no more a history of the times than any equally complete biography would be. It is, however, no mere character sketch of a man, and to say this is to pay a compliment to the book even in these days of personality writing run mad.

Evolution Clarified

NEW VIEWS OF EVOLUTION. By George Perrigo Conger, Ph.D. 235 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

By MAYNARD SHIPLEY

HERE at last is a book on evolution which comports strictly with its title. As Associate Professor of Philosophy in the University of Minnesota (a State which was obliged to fight an anti-evolution bill in 1927, and which is the home of the egregious anti-evolutionist, W. B. Riley), the author sees the various aspects of the situation "clearly and sees them whole." The book is the more interesting, and, for the lay public, the more valuable, just because it was written neither by a paleontolgist, a zoologist, nor a biologist. Dr. Conger knows the literature of his subject, and brings to his discussion a mind broadened by his studies in philosophy.

He does not enter this field as a novice, for he has ably discussed the philosophical aspect of evolution in his widely used textbook, "A Course in Philosophy." The present volume is a worthy addition to the "Philosophy for the Layman" series, edited by that thoroughly competent fellow-philosopher, Professor Roy Wood Sellers, of the University of Michigan.

In Conger's book one meets for the first time an adequate discussion of the difference between evolution and evolutionism. Contrary to opinions frequently encountered, he says, "evolution is neither a hypothesis, a theory, nor a law; to call it any of these is to confuse it with evolutionism." He then goes on to draw a clear distinction between hypothesis, theory, and law. The word "evolution," as he uses it, is "a name for a process or processes which are said to occur in the world." Just what these processes are "said to be," and whether or not they actually do occur, forms the subject matter of the book.

"Evolutionism" Professor Conger defines as the descriptions of evolutionary processes, "whether they occur or not," and he includes "whatever hypotheses, theories, or laws are employed in descriptions or speculations concerning them"; whereas "evolution" is the name of a process, "evolutionism" being "a name for statements about that process." But evolutionism is, on the whole, stronger than a mere hypothesis, and may be considered as a theory. The two terms are, indeed, often interchangeable, "but sometimes the distinction is important."

Professor Conger is concerned, also, to show that evolution is not confined to biology or to living organisms. It is, of course, natural that biological evolution should have received the greater emphasis, and for this reason it is "evolution in biology, rather than any other science, which has come most sharply into conflict with the traditional account [of creation, in the Book of Genesis] and with the various theological doctrines based on it."

As to this, we need not be too confident. Our Fundamentalist friends merely had their attention called first to the biological side of the question. For some years none of them "would touch a book of Darwin's with a ten-foot pole." Last year the State University of Florida and the State Women's College (co-education not prevailing in that State) had their libraries ransacked by a committee of ten (clergymen) authorized by the State Senate to ferret out heretical books on history and psychology—more especially on psychoanalysis. And similarly in Minnesota itself and also in Missouri the most recent attacks have been made on sociological works.

However, Dr. Conger is, generally speaking, on the right track. George W. Rappleyea, of Scopes trial fame, was struck in the face by an irate Baptist barber during a public meeting in Dayton because he was thought to imply that the barber's grandmother was "a monkey." Taken by and large—as evidenced in the recent successful initiative act in Arkansas—it is the biological issue that is most provocative. But the Fundamentalists are on their way to anthropology, social science and genetic psychology. They are now more keenly aware than before of the fact, pointed out by Dr. Conger, that the theory of evolution "is encountered not merely in biology but in practically every other science now studied." And this fact will not tend to make the struggle less bitter.

In a book that should, at least, appeal to a very wide circle of readers it is fortunate that Professor Conger has emphasized the fact that "evolution is not to be thought of [as it usually is] as a process moving, so to speak, in a straightforward way from simple forms to more and more complex forms, or from 'lower' to 'higher' forms; in other words, the process is not in one line, or unilinear, and not in one direction, or unidirectional." There is, of course, nothing "new" in this view of evolution, but it requires reiteration.

Moreover, the course of evolution is marked by regressions as well as advances. . . . Where we look for evolution we seem often to find only devolution, or regression. Instances of regression in social evolution are so frequent as to be disheartening. . . . Certainly it is clear enough that even in the social field, where we most confidently expect it, evolution is one thing and progress another.

In the slow progress of science it is not to be expected that evolutionists should be in agreement on matters of detail—the data at present necessarily being fragmentary, and in some cases apparently contradictory.

Perhaps one of the most surprising conclusions arrived at by Professor Conger is that "evolution is in the last analysis not a matter of evidence but a matter of inference."

Some students of the complete "evidence" now available will not be quite willing to agree with this statement, even though cognizant of the inescapable logic of the "inference" based on the evidence. However, it must be admitted that evidence which "compels belief" in one person "by no means compels it in another." Usually it is not difficult to explain why such evidence does not "compel" conviction of a favorable nature in certain types of mind. Evolution and psychology explain such persons and their beliefs. The motives for disbelief are themselves questionable.

Each of the ten highly informative chapters, devoted to one of the various aspects of evolution, contains some views of evolution which may justly be termed "new," at least to the average lay student—and certainly to the anti-evolutionist. Professor Conger's book is in every way well worth the reading, either by the specialist or by the interested layman.

Therese Benson, the unknown author of "The Unknown Daughter," has written a new novel called "The Go-Between," which is announced for publication about the middle of January by Dodd, Mead & Co. The two principal characters are a novelist and a publisher's reader. The novelist hides his identity behind a pen name, and the reader signs her reports on the manuscripts of aspiring authors with a name that is not her own. The two meet and fall in love with each other, neither suspecting who the other is. Another novel dealing with a novelist is "The Redemption of Morley Darville," by Stephen McKenna. This, too, will appear in mid-January, bearing the Dodd, Mead imprint.

THE BIG BIOGRAPHY OF THE SEASON

FRANKLIN

The Apostle of Modern Times

By BERNARD FAŸ

Notable, because in it a Frenchman presents Franklin for the first time not as an idealized historical figure but as a real man; because it gives a magnificent picture of 18th-century Boston, Philadelphia, London and Paris; and because of the breadth, depth and Gallic wit of its style. In this vivid biography the reader will find the good Doctor "a perfect friend, cheerful and fond of good living, a hearty drinker and a good story-teller" as well as an unforgettable personality.

Here is an extraordinary book value—made possible by the large printings totaling 75,000 copies in advance of publication. It is a large octavo volume (6½ x 9½ inches) of 547 pages, containing 20 illustrations and maps.

Eyes Toward Mecca

THE HOLY CITIES OF ARABIA. By Aldon Rutter. Two Volumes. 303 pp. and 287 pp. Illustrated. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $10.

By MANUEL KOMROFF

ONCE in the life of every good Mohammedan must he make the pilgrimage to Mecca. Here stands the holy shrine that washes clean Mohammedan sins. Prince or beggar, merchant or thief, all are required to undertake this perilous journey, be it only from Egypt across the Dead Sea or from far distant India and Java. But Jews, Christians and people of other faiths are strictly forbidden to touch foot on this sacred ground. More especially Christians. Of all races of mankind Christians are the most despised in the eyes of the Arab. When he calls you "dog" it is only a term of reproach; when he calls you "Jew" it is insult; but when he cries out "Nazarene!" it is a signal for fight.

A generation or two ago one could have twirled the large globe on the library table and pointed to a dozen spots that were "forbidden" ground. Today only a few such places remain. Mecca is one of these; and the added element of danger only makes it more attractive. Any travel record into this part of Arabia is important, and Mr. Rutter's "Holy Cities of Arabia" is no exception to the rule. Time has not helped diminish the danger and difficulty of such a journey.

When we mention the holy cities of El Medina and Mecca we at once think of such famous travelers as Burckhardt and Richard Burton. There were others also, but not many. In fact, if one took the trouble to search the records one would find that in the past 400 years less than eighteen Christians have ever come out of Mecca alive. A brief and entertaining history of sixteen of these travelers, called "Christians at Mecca" by Augustus Ralli, was published several years ago. This able little volume summarizes the account of each traveler and also gives a brief comparison of their records and tells how their observations differed. Neither Doughty nor Musil, two of the greatest Arabian explorers, ever ventured into Mecca.

Richard Burton accomplished the journey disguised as an Egyptian doctor. His skin was dyed with henna. But once, and only once, the sharp eye of an Arab penetrated through the make-up. Fortunately (so Burton said) the Arab was found dead the next morning. Some years later, at Burton's wedding breakfast, a doctor asked: "How does it feel after killing a man?" "Quite jolly, doctor," he replied, "how do you?" And the dangers that Burton found (he journeyed in 1853) and noted in his classical record are found to be no less than those encountered by Rutter. It is only in reading Burckhardt's "Travels in Arabia," a volume that well deserves reprinting, for though a century old it can be correctly called the foundation of all Western knowledge of Mecca, that one loses the sense of peril. This travel record, for facts, details, accurate historical knowledge, careful observation and intimacy with Mohammedan customs has never been equaled or surpassed in its field. Burckhardt, a Swiss, knew too much about Arabia to ever realize for a moment a feeling of danger.

In modern travel literature, Arabia has been a chosen ground. No land has, from a literary standpoint, been more fortunate. In English alone it has prompted the writing of three classics: i. e., records of Burckhardt, Burton and Doughty. And there are lesser names, as great as Musil and Gertrude Bell. Why this arid land should attract the greatest is not easy to answer. Perhaps one reason might be that no land and no people have changed less since biblical times than Arabia.

It would really be difficult to point to a place on the map of the world where the people are more primitive, more ignorant and as fanatical. And more than this: the Arab is a liar, a cheat, a rascal, a cutthroat, a person who lives in filth, eats with his hands, sleeps in vermin (Broadway writers of desert songs please note), he is cruel to his animals, he treats his women and children like beasts, (and Hollywood directors of Sheik movies also kindly note) he is quite lawless, intolerant, and to his fellow-men he is treacherous. The reviewer is aware that recently some Englishman has devoted an entire volume to the defense of the Arab, but, in case of need, his reply would be in the words of Burckhardt: "My pursuits are base and degrading because they oblige me almost exclusively to mix and live for many years with whatever is infamous, abject and wretched in human nature . . ."

Let us not delay any longer. We must travel with Eldon Rutter to this forbidden city of Mecca. The streets are narrow and winding. The dogs are asleep and even if you tread upon them they refuse to move. There are no beautiful and gilded domes and no splendid turrets. The country about is barren and hilly. But it is the largest town in all of Arabia and it has some craftsmen who do handiwork and some trade. The Meccans themselves describe their chief activity when they say: "We sow no corn nor durra, for the pilgrims are our crops." And there is also a slave market still situated in the same place, the old stone steps in the narrow street behind the temple.

Pause just for a moment to admire these dark-skinned boys and girls about to be sold and you will probably hear a merchant's confidential voice: "Would you like to buy an excellent slave girl? I have one in the house—beautiful. We can go and see her?" Some of the very best girl slaves are sold privately and are not displayed on the stone steps. And those here in the market will let down their veils and say: "Oh buy us, sir. Buy us. We are faithful. We are devoted. We will serve you always. Buy us. Oh, why can't you buy us?"

One of the very best descriptions, in all travel literature, of the Mecca holy temple (Kaaba) is to be found in these volumes by Rutter. The author knew what to look for before he came there and he describes what he saw in simple and vivid language. You see clearly before you the rude stone cube-like building, windowless and with its door high above the ground. This holy spot marks the graves of Hagar and Ishmael; it contains the famous black stone that was supposed to be given by the angel Gabriel to Abraham. This stone is kissed by devoted pilgrims. And when repairs are necessary to the old walls of this building the mortar is mixed with rose water. Are the walls of this temple filled with gold coins? Legend says yes, and though it would seem incredible it may be recalled that when the tomb chamber of the Prophet at El Medina was opened it contained jewels and ornaments to the value of $10,000,000! This mystery as well as others connected with the Mecca temple the author has not attempted to solve. His travel record will never rival the classics in this field, but it marks, nevertheless, a valuable addition to Arabian travel literature. It not only contains the best and most detailed description of the temple yet recorded, but it gives many interesting side lights and abounds with information, historical and religious, that greatly help the reader to understand the Mohammedan pilgrim (of whom there are anywhere from 50,000 to 100,000 in a single year), as well as the natives of Arabia who hold the holy shrines of Mohammed the Prophet, worshiped today by over 200,000,000 souls.

Life in Old Turkey

UNDER FIVE SULTANS. By Mary Mills Patrick, President Emerita of Constantinople Woman's College. Illustrated. 357 pp. New York: The Century Company. $4.

By N. MARTINOVITCH

THESE are the memoirs of an American woman whose life work as head of the American College for Girls in Constantinople has won her international recognition. Born and educated in New England, Miss Patrick was appointed in 1871 a teacher of the American school in Erzerum, and in 1875 was transferred to Constantinople in order "to be a factor in the development of the future Woman's College" there. Thus she passed more than half a century in Turkey and really lived under five Sultans (Abdul Aziz, Murad V, Abdul Hamid II, Mohammed V and VI), as she announced in the title.

The pictures of Oriental life and nature which we find in Miss Patrick's book are very valuable. She remarks that one of the principal rules of life in Turkey was, until the foundation of the new republic, the formula, "Yavash, yavash"—"slowly, slowly." One can find the same rule everywhere in the Near East; the Arabs says "Shuaye, shuaye" and the Greeks "Siga, siga." Certain mistakes are to be noticed in the sketch of the religious customs of Islam, especially in the question of the caliphate and its abolishment. But the author must be pardoned; this question is clear only to Orientalists, and many great European historians have made the same mistake. The ethnographical material contained in the book is abundant and excellent. Particularly interesting and authoritative are Miss Patrick's comments on Turkish education, folklore and literature.

Her historical outline of Turkey is almost irreproachable. The aim of this outline is "a study of two prevailing types in former rulers of that nation, i. e., those who were ready for progress and those who feared changes of all kinds." With this aim in view, Miss Patrick has summarized the history of Turkey from the beginning of the empire until the present time. Her sympathy for the Sultan Mohammed II, the conqueror of Constantinople, because of his tolerance toward the Christian communities, and for Mahmud II, because of his European reforms, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, is evident. In the pages dealing with the history of the old period of the Ottoman Empire I noticed only one mistake: Osman, the founder of the empire, never had the title of Sultan, but that of Emir, and the date of his accession to the throne was not 1288, but 1299.

In the chapters about the more recent period of Turkish history, Miss Patrick gives us a brilliant and strong criticism of the policy of Disraeli and a vivid portrait of Midhat Pasha, the famous father of the Turkish Constitution. The question whether the death of Abdul Aziz was due to murder or suicide has been discussed many times, and Miss Patrick gives us valuable data in support of the suicide theory. The time of the bloody Abdul Hamid is justly characterized as "the rule of spies." The rôle played by European diplomats is well characterized; she says (the best formula I have ever read) that every one of them always thought, "How much of Turkey can I get for my country?" pointing out that they failed to understand the depth of the national feeling of the Turks.

The period after the Turkish revolution of 1908 is described, not without irony, in two chapters entitled "Paradise on Earth" and "Awakening from a Dream." Here we have many interesting pictures of the Young Turk reforms as well as of the characteristics, not always favorable, of several Turkish leaders. A reader with a good knowledge of this period must be surprised that among the names mentioned he cannot find that of A. N. Mandelstam, the dragoman of the Russian Embassy, an imposing person who played a great rôle in the politics of Constantinople at the time of the revolution of 1908. He was also one of the first historians of the empire of the Young Turks.

Naturally, Miss Patrick, in describing the modern period of Turkey, gives a biographical sketch of her beloved child—the American Woman's College. Thanks to her pen we are better informed regarding the importance this philanthropic institution has had for Turkey, for the Near East generally and also for the good name of the United States in the Orient.

A rich bibliography is added at the end, and among the books quoted we can find not only popular, but even some old, scholarly works known to the specialists in the subject exclusively.

Mr. Leacock's Sketches

THE IRON MAN AND THE TIN WOMAN. By Stephen Leacock. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

MR. LEACOCK is a genuine humorist. His "My Financial Career," one of his first and best sketches, has become a classic and still lingers pleasantly in many anthologies and many minds. No one has succeeded better in certain forms of burlesque, such as his take-off on sea castaways, some (not all) of his nonsense novels; and his remarks on Oxford University must always be an atmospheric joy to those who revel in the frailties of institutional learning. He has not stretched our patience by the reiterations of his personality, nor exposed it more than to point a moral and adorn a tale.

Why, then, does he present us with a book like "The Iron Man and the Tin Woman?" They are all there, the old familiar faces.

Quite possibly the fault is not Mr. Leacock's. The genuine humorist, always rare, in these hurried days is hard put to it. The obscene speed with which everything is communicated to everybody deflates all surprises in advance, and there is no more perishable raw material than the humorous character. No sooner is he born into the limelight—than he is savagely fallen upon by the columnists, the cartoonists, the ubiquitous joke-smiths who, with the voracious ardor of Siberian wolves, dismember him before our eyes. As long ago as twenty years, the medical specialist as a subject for satire was thus dismembered by Peter Dunne (Mr. Dooley). State paternalism showed its fell features in 1916 and ran the gauntlet, imaginary lovers being licensed for purposes of osculation by the town police.

Even the man from Mars, who, like locusts or Halley's comet, should never appear oftener than every seventeen years, is dragged from his orbit by Mr. Leacock, his last appearance, I believe, having been about 1922. "The Iron Man and the Tin Woman" who are featured in the title never did more than forty laughs before they reached that comic-cut bourne from which no traveler returns—or should.

All praise, however, must be allowed to Mr. Leacock for his subtlety. He might have erred in this respect, and—in common with some of his compatriots—fed us from a bottle. But being a professor himself, he knows that the student must do his part, even in humor. If the art of thinking is moribund among us, he would help us to revive it by exercising our own wits to extract laughter from his concealed meaning. In short, you must dig for it to get it.

The East's New Era

diya movement in India, which has likewise broken through the scholasticism of Islam and helped to free the East for a profound influence of Western education and culture. On the other hand, there are two outstanding reactions toward the older Islam hardly less lacking in vitality, the rise again to power of the Wahabis of Southern Arabia, after five generations of obscurity, and the continued advance in Moslem prestige of their spiritual cousins in puritanical and abstentious orthodoxy, the Sennussi of Northern Africa.

So far as the Pan-Islamic world responds to the common bond of its religion these are the tendencies which are binding together its most vigorous sections today. The cement of nationalism has also been aided by the logic of events in Persia, Afghanistan and Turkey, which are now experiencing the most complete freedom from European interference they have had for generations. Something like a general renaissance is taking place in each of these countries now that they possess the alternative of some other direction for their energies than self-defense. It is notable that in each of them the direction has taken form toward a strongly developed national spirit, and that the first manifestations of that spirit have been liberalism, parliamentarianism and an awkward but genuine attempt at popular sovereignty. So far as widespread influence among the people is concerned the effect of these things so far is scarcely more than fiction. But the author marks with acrimonious insistence that the old British idea of gentlemanliness, conventional education in the classics and the moderated demeanor toward politics with British influence held out as the only recognizable signs of progress, is no longer seriously regarded in this new world, and that for the first time the old nations of the East are building their new nationhood out of the vital ideas of their own past.

It has been the Indians' most constant and rankling protest against England that literally nothing was held out to the Indian people by their British conquerors in the world of education except almost an exact imitation of the English system. It was inevitable that to practice law or medicine or government, or to continue to hand along, the torch of this type of education a class of Indians should have been created whose conscious ignorance of their own people and their own racial traditions filled them with an increasing resentment which was further inflamed by the scorn of their conquerors at the insufficiency and the purely derivative character of their knowledge. This is to state a broad condition and to ignore many brilliant exceptions, such as the seven sons of Debendranath Tagore, one of whom became a distinguished philosopher, another a famous musician, and the third, Rabindranath Tagore, perhaps the greatest of Bengali poets. But such capacity for transmutation was generally beyond even the exceptional individual. Clearly, according to the author, it was the central duty of British tutelage to educate Indians to understand India rather than to educate them solely in imitation of themselves. The penalty is that the half-educated are "ungrateful," and have been since Indians' thoughts began to turn inward toward the close of Queen Victoria's reign. They seek first to remove their own anomaly in the scheme of things by insisting that India is a nation, a conception that was never included in the Victorian curriculum.

Nationalism likewise turns to national industries, and here Asia begins to display tendencies again copied from Europe, from the rebellion of the handicrafts to the demand of native manufacturers for a tariff. Neither tendency is dignified or edifying. The East is full of beautiful dying handicrafts, which are utilized by Gandhi as symbols of the future life of the nation. But when things like this rest on popular choice there is only one decision possible. When cloth is produced one-fifth as cheaply as before it finds a market. When conveniences appear which lighten the burden of life they are adopted as fast as means are found to obtain them. The arrogant white man is in this case on the side of destiny and the revival of handicrafts is a beautiful but impracticable Nirvana. The Indian peasant long ago decided to purchase the things made by machines, because he could buy more of them for less money. A few thousand revivalists of handicrafts cannot stem the wants of millions—more especially now that Indians are running the factories.

Nationalism in the East involves organic social changes as well as political development. If, in the author's words, they follow familiar stream-beds there is a flood behind which has only just begun to flow. And an already proved capacity to make new courses and to follow them with an increasing and disturbing boldness finds in this book a comprehensive and purposeful expression.

War and Peace

anyhow, puttees over boots, feet swelled and unfelt, stumbling, but slouching on again.

It is in these contrasts that the originality, the power and the beauty of "The Wet Flanders Plain" lie. Other books, holding strictly to the war-scene, have made the world shudder at the unceasing cruelty and horror of the struggle that was ended ten years ago. But it may be an open question whether such books do not decrease their effectiveness by their uninterrupted concentration. The mind can be dulled to horror by reason of fatigue. As an argument against war, a persuasion from war—and this, we take it, is the purpose underlying present war literature—the power of "The Wet Flanders Plain" is immensely enhanced by the lesson inherent in just these contrasts.

Occasionally in the book past and present mingle in a single paragraph or two, as when Williamson writes of the Labyrinthe, a height from which the Germans in 1915 commanded the Arras-Bethune road.

The Labyrinthe, with its machine-gun cupolas and deep dugouts and belts of wire, its trench system like the web of a garden spider, was one of the many tragedies of the French people.

Elsewhere the white chalk thrown up by the bombardments has been partly ploughed in, or covered by grass; on the Labyrinthe it remains white, a wide expanse of chalk darkened when the sun shines with the shadow of crosses. For, packed close together, and in pairs, back to back, the crosses that are planted in the bare chalk are a vast and terrible sight. Acres of crosses, acres of blackness, nearly 100,000 symbols of crucifixion.

"The Wet Flanders Plain" is, as we have said, a small book. Yet from it seems to emanate something rather rare, and not easy to classify. Henry Williamson, although he endured four years of war's hardship, is not embittered. There is nothing of rancor in his pages. And although he is furthest from being a militarist, there is nothing sentimental in his pacifism. For him, war is waste; intolerable, unthinkable, immoral waste. Why should there be wars? His few pages are a new poem of Flanders Field, but with a different perspective and a different conclusion. For, although Henry Williamson draws no conclusion and points no moral, it becomes clear that to his mind loyalty to those of "the lost generation" who lie beneath the Flanders Plain would exert itself in working to make impossible a repetition of such human waste.

THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE PROBLEM. 167 pp. New York: National Industrial Conference Board, Inc. $2.50.

THIS volume is the latest in the series being published by the National Industrial Conference Board dealing with the chief phases of the problems resulting from the changes, due to the World War, in the economic position of the United States. Other aspects concerned with finance and foreign trade have been or will be examined and discussed in other volumes. This present study takes up the significance of this country's changed position as a maritime nation, the influence an American merchant marine and the policies adopted toward it may have on the international trade and financial relationships of the United States, its importance and service as a business and as a factor in our international economic life, and its vital relation to national security. The purpose of the book is not to advocate specific proposals, either new or old, for the solution of the merchant marine problem, but merely to bring together the result of the conference board's researches upon the question and thus to promote public understanding of it by setting forth clearly and in their due relation facts and controversial issues. There is a study of basic considerations in merchant marine policy followed by a long and careful exposition of the present situation, which deals with the status of the American merchant marine, the operations and policy of the United States Shipping Board, the status and relations of private American shipping interests, the relation to foreign trade of the American merchant marine and its significance in the matter of national defense. The second section of the volume discusses the favorable and unfavorable factors which affect the maintenance of an American merchant marine and the third suggests means for improving it and its services.

There is a preface by Magnus W. Alexander, president of the conference board, who explains that the volume was prepared by H. K. Murphey, of the board's research staff, under the supervision of the board's staff economic council, and that the conclusions expressed in this, as in all the conference board's publications, "are those of the conference board as a body."

THE SMALL TOWNS

SMALL TOWNS. An Estimate of Their Trade and Culture. By Walter Burr. 287 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

HERE is an attempt, individual, dynamic and unafraid, to dig out the basic facts in the present-day agricultural and small-town situation, to set forth their evolution from the conditions of the similar national groups of former years as far back as pioneer times and to estimate their present relationship to other groups and to the general life of the country as a whole. It does not belong to the repressed, student-lamp, research type of book that usually embodies the results of such investigations. Mr. Burr, who is Professor of Rural Sociology in the University of Missouri and has spent many years studying rural life in that and other Western States, has taken his facts, not from other people's books and reports, but from his own observations, and so, although they may thus represent a narrower circle of life, they have freshness and vitality and genuine human quality. He has drawn from his observations, which seem to have been made chiefly in the Middle West, his own conclusions, and he is not in the least disturbed—in fact, he seems to be rather pleased if they do not agree with accepted ideas concerning the current situation of agricultural and small-town communities. Most of them are more or less upsetting to conventional ideas and traditional formulas and abruptly challenging to opinions widely held. But they are the outcome of realistic knowledge and they have their feet on the ground and not in books or accepted theories.

Mr. Burr studies the conditions and the methods of this small-town and agricultural life as it is today in relation to its and the general economic situation, to political affairs, to education and religion and endeavors to integrate and estimate its culture as a whole. As for that absorbing matter of "agricultural relief," he is convinced that if any section or group of individuals of the farm life of the country need "relief" it is because they are trying to farm without recognition of the fact that farming is a capitalistic business, and, just like any other business, demands that the farmer start in with enough capital to establish and carry it on until it yields returns. Instead, the farmer of the past, he contends, was accustomed to go into debt at the start, and the baleful conditions thus widely caused are still exercising a noxious influence.

MAN'S BEGINNINGS

DUST TO LIFE. The Scientific Story of Creation. By Burton Peter Thom. Illustrated. 409 pp. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $5.

ONE closes Dr. Thom's volume with the feeling that his title is neither quite accurate nor wholly adequate. For his book is bigger and better than it indicates—even if it does not tell how dust became life or how creation was achieved. What it does tell is that story which seems to be exercising in recent years a much increased fascination upon the mind of man, since many men and many books are turning eagerly to its narrating, the most marvelous and most enchanting story that has ever been told, the story of the evolution of star-dust into man. It is one of the curiosities of the writing world that each one who tells it gives it a different aspect from any of the others. For in all of them the facts, the events, the narrative outline are all the same.

Perhaps none of them has yet perceived and put into words the full possibilities of the tale. But Dr. Thom has made, in comparison with many others, a very successful attempt to give to his readers some realization of the fascination, the marvelousness, the awesomeness of the story. His success is in part due to his arrangement of the factors and stages of the development of matter from atoms to man, but more to his method of treatment and still more to the spirit in which he has envisaged the whole process and endeavored to make his reader see it in the same wholeness and light. For he perceives it with something of the poet's imagination, although scientifically he is accurate and dependable in all his facts and statements. But it must be charged against him that his writing is too often careless and slovenly. At the end he shows man in clear contrast of his present state against that which he once was, even after he became man, and takes a look, by the light of evolutionary science, into his future, seeing him there still undergoing the processes of change and becoming something different from what he now is.

FORESTRY

FORESTS AND MANKIND. By Charles Lathrop Pack and Tom Gill. Illustrated. 280 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $3.

AQUAINTLY interesting spirit touches this book here and there with an unusual glow. It comes of a feeling about and toward trees known to those who love them greatly and are much among them—the feeling that is some vague, mystic way they are closely akin to human beings. More than any other English-writing poet, our own Lanier had this feeling, recognized and prized the kinship, and gave the spirit expression in some of his finest poems. Messrs. Pack and Gill have worked with and among trees so much that the feeling has apparently become fundamental in their mental equipment as it is in the significance of their title. But, as they were writing a practical book about how essential forests are to man, it escapes into their text only in odd little ways, turns of phraseology, brief flashes of meaning—"the eternal partnership of man and trees," the forests as "man's loyal ally," "trees from the first have been our stanch and constant friends." From beginning to end it is a practical book about a highly important practical matter, but it is enlivened and made more interesting by the occasional gleam of this graceful sentiment.

The two authors speak with the voice of authority upon their subject, for both have been lifelong students of forestry and its importance to man, and both have long and importantly been identified with its development in this country. They begin by telling why the tree is "the masterpiece of the plant world" and what are its methods of growth, then explain the battle for life in the forest, tell something of the changes that are constantly going on in the forests, making those of today very different from those of ages ago, and analyze the forest conditions that now obtain throughout the world. This brings them to our own country, whose forests, they say, "are unrivaled in the number of commercially important tree species they contain." More than 850 species reach tree size, and if varieties and hybrids are added "the total of different forms of tree life comes close to 1,200." Of these 180 already have economic importance, and "this number constantly increases, as new uses are found for species formerly considered valueless." Analysis and brief description of our forests is followed by explanation of what forestry endeavors to accomplish and of the methods of forestry, an outline of its development in the United States and a clear account of what it is doing in our national forests. Half the book is devoted to exposition of the close relationship of forests to man, of their gifts to him and his dependence on them, of their enemies, including man, which will more and more deplete them unless he comes to their help. Throughout the book the authors earnestly set forth the urgent necessity, especially in the United States, of a wider appreciation and a more general use of the principles and methods of forestry alike by nation, States, large private owners and small farmers with their woodlots.

PROHIBITION APOLOGIA

THE INSIDE OF PROHIBITION. By Mabel Walker Willebrandt. 341 pp. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.

WHEN Mrs. Willebrandt's book had newspaper serial publication last Summer it aroused controversy, and some of her statements were flatly contradicted by people to whom they referred. In permanent form she has made it even more controversial, for with deplorably bad taste she has included in an appendix five political and very partisan speeches which she made during the Presidential campaign of last year, thus increasing whatever appearance the volume may have of its being intended to be a work of personal defense and lessening its value as a specially informed presentation and discussion of the question and the problems of prohibition.

Mrs. Willebrandt was for eight years, beginning in August, 1921, Assistant Attorney General of the United States in charge of prohibition, and therefore she ought to be able to give the American public large amounts of that inside information about the workings and the achievements of the law for the enforcement of prohibition for which it seems to yearn. But notwithstanding its title the work is written, apparently, with the aim in view of showing that if prohibition has not been enforced during these eight years it has not been the fault of her office. She has, in short, "passed the buck" even more cleverly than have those other offices and people whom she accuses of playing that game to the detriment of prohibition enforcement. But she does it so convincingly and with such good logic and common sense inherent in her argument as to make what she says worth the careful reading of any one who wants to be well informed on this angrily mooted question. Especially is this true of the conclusions to which she has come as to measures which would improve prohibition enforcement. Her statement and discussion of such steps take on additional importance from the fact that they are set forward as the chief reasons why her administration of her office did not meet with greater success.

One of the most important reasons for the lack of results, she says, was due to the fact that the duty of her office was merely to prosecute cases after the prohibition unit of the Treasury Department had gathered the evidence, and she emphatically insists that the prohibition unit should be transferred to the Department of Justice and responsibility centred in it alone. What she calls "the big leak" and considers the most important single source of liquor supply is "the alcohol diverted illegally from concerns bearing the stamp of respectability in the form of a government permit," and she thinks that this could be well-nigh stopped by tightening and improving administrative and executive action. The chapter devoted to this matter is one of the most illuminating in the book. The border patrol should, the author says, be strengthened and consolidated and coordinated on both sides of the international line on both the northern and the southern border. There should be personal effort by the Attorney General to secure the cooperation of United States district judges in the improving of juries and in bettering the type and increasing the number of United States commissioners. So also the President, the Attorney General and the Civil Service Commission should cooperate "to elevate civil service standards for prohibition agents." And the public in general should aid by endeavoring to devise "a better system of elective control" to amend "the present grave breakdown in city government," by means of drives by dry organizations for the education and mobilization of public opinion, and by means of publicity obtained by civic associations for the conduct of public affairs by public officials.

PHOTOGRAPHY'S FINE POINTS

THE ART OF THE PHOTOGRAPHER. A Guide to Pictorial and Artistic Work in Photography. By Edward Drummond Young. Illustrated. 154 pp. The New Art Library. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. $6.

BEING himself both a photographer and painter, Mr. Young of the faculty of the College of Art, Edinburgh, has definite convictions as to the possibilities of both mediums for artistic expression and of the ways in which knowledge of the methods of each can help to success in the other. He thinks that the artistic possibilities of photography are not appreciated and generally developed as they should be. "A photograph," he says, "can be one of the most beautiful things made by man. As a mere rendering of form, tone, texture and values it cannot be approached by any other graphic method."

In this book he attempts to give

Amazing Tributes to its Superiority

"This book is a real advance in the art of dictionary making."—MAX MASON, Former President of the University of Chicago.

"Just as Noah Webster's dictionary met better conditions of 1828, so this dictionary reflects the standards of present day America."—Charlotte, North Carolina, Observer.

"This dictionary is a convenient thing to handle; but its content is not too concentrated for the sake of convenience. It has a very liberal and helpful inclusion of new words, which makes it especially useful and modern."—BOOTH TARKINGTON.

"I marvel that you have gotten so much information in so small a space."—W. H. P. FAUNCE, Pres. of Brown Univ.

"I have examined the book with great interest and see that I shall find it a most valuable and important addition to my library. The definitions have two great qualities of precision and compactness. The various appendixes are highly useful."—GAMALIEL BRADFORD, author of "Portraits of American Women", etc.

A Citizen of the Far Horizons

ENDS OF THE EARTH. By Roy Chapman Andrews. Illustrated. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, London. $4.50.

By HENRY E. ARMSTRONG

IN this lively and entertaining book, so full of thrills there is scarcely room for anything else, Roy Chapman Andrews has brought together his adventures in many seas and jungles. They were full of hazards, but he wouldn't have had it otherwise. Beloit, Wis., was responsible for Mr. Andrews. He began exploring Rock River as soon as he could walk. "Every moment that I could steal from school," he says, "was spent in the woods along the banks or on the water itself." At the age of 9 he acquired his first shotgun, to the terror of his mother. His father had said: "We can't keep him away from guns. He will get one somewhere and keep it hidden. It will be much less dangerous if I buy him one and teach him how to use it." He had an uncontrollable passion for adventure. Once he came near drowning when his canoe upset in Rock River. He reached the shore only after a desperate swim in icy water. The boy was marked for exploration, discovery and living in the wild and out-of-the-way parts of the world, with savages, fierce beasts, strange birds and fishes, as a zoologist, ornithologist, anthropologist and hunter. If the greatest happiness consists in working off tremendous enthusiasm in enterprises of one's own choice, Roy Chapman Andrews must always have been one of the happiest of mortals.

With $30, made by stuffing deer heads and birds, young Andrews came to New York in 1906 (after graduating from Beloit College) to seek his fortune. Naturally he made straight for the American Museum of Natural History. The director, Dr. H. C. Bumpus, had nothing for him to do.

"You have to have some one to scrub the floors, don't you?" I asked.

"Of course," said he, "but a man with a college education doesn't want to begin his career scrubbing floors." "No," I said, "I don't want to wash just any floors, but the museum floors are different."

He was taken on, and scrub them he did. He also mixed clay for modeling, and helped to prepare animal and bird skins for mounting. "Never before or since have I been so happy." One may take the liberty to doubt that. Andrews wanted to get "to the ends of the earth" and to risk his own skin in high adventure. The day he was introduced to Frank M. Chapman, who had written his bible, "Handbook of North American Birds," he "nearly suffocated with delight." He used to hang about the meteorites in the foyer at 1 o'clock to see Henry Fairfield Osborn going to lunch, but never did he expect to meet the great man. The time was to come, however, when President Osborn, forming a high opinion of Andrews's good sense, zeal and intrepidity, sent him far afield again and again in the service of the museum. Never did Mr. Osborn have cause to regret his confidence.

Andrews's first expedition was to Amagansett, L. I., to acquire Captain Joseph Edwards's whale, harpooned alongshore. He was to bring the skeleton back and mount it. A storm had dispersed many of the bones after the fisherman cut away the fat and blubber. The bones were found and assembled, although it was necessary to recover the two pelvic bones from the trying-pot. The museum wanted more whales, and Andrews, in the Spring of 1908, persuaded Dr. Bumpus to let him go to Vancouver and Alaskan waters to get them. From Victoria he shipped to Barclay Sound, where a motley crew of Americans, Asiatics and Indians were hunting leviathan. "We had a rough passage. Great Scott, wasn't I seasick!" Andrews never became the best of sailors. But he learned wh[illegible] there was to know about diffe[illegible]t species of whales, and hunte[illegible] them in that part of the Pacific [illegible]en he passed on to Alaska, late[illegible] Korea, where he sought and found a specimen that was growing rare, the gray whale. To the museum in New York his work was invaluable.

Between expeditions he did routine jobs and lectured about his adventures. In June, 1909, the director called Andrews to the office. "Would you like to go to Borneo and the Dutch East Indies?" "It was ridiculous to ask me if I wanted to go anywhere. I wanted to go everywhere." The Bureau of Fisheries had asked the museum for the loan of Andrews, who would go on a cruise with the exploring ship Albatross. At Cavite he boarded her to collect specimens of mammals and birds in the Dutch East Indies. He reveled in undreamed-of opportunities. One of his adventures was climbing the sub-active volcano (5,600 feet) in the Island of Ternate. "On the way up I felt as though I was going through a grocer's shop, for the lower slopes of the mountain are covered with pepper, nutmeg, clove and cocoa trees." He had "a good look into the giant pit," and was lucky in his weather—otherwise, he would not have escaped asphyxiation. It was a long cruise of the Albatross through the archipelago, but Andrews, hunting and collecting, enjoyed every day of it.

There followed an experience with Japanese whalers and sealers, which was fruitful of results. Andrews sent home twenty tons of skeletons. He had a fancy to penetrate the Korean jungle, of which white men knew almost nothing, and this was gratified on a new expedition. Many of the mammals and birds found "were new to science." Another excursion took him to the Pribilof Islands in Bering Sea to study seal life. Later Andrews was off to Yunnan Province, China, on a zoological quest. He had proposed a series of expeditions to Central Asia to extend over ten years. A complete collection of mammals was made. Afterward came Mongolia, and Andrews entered upon his most ambitious work—the discovery of primitive human remains and traces of man's evolution. About that he has written another book, and will write more. In "Ends of the Earth," adventure is his subject, and the record is fascinating in the extreme.

A Doctor on the Old Frontier

A FRONTIER DOCTOR. By Henry F. Hoyt. Introduction by Frank B. Kellogg. Illustrated. 260 pp. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

THIS narrative of days in the Northwest and the Southwest, away back in the '70s and the '80s, when the frontier was a definite, dramatic, picturesque, dynamic and deadly region, makes a contribution of real interest and value to the story of that unique section of our American history. Moreover, it is highly entertaining. Dr. Hoyt spent a buoyant youth and young manhood, both of them evidently well endowed with the energy and high spirts of youth and health and strength, on these two frontiers, and one gathers from his memories of the time that he was a good mixer and that he must have had an attractive and magnetic personality, for wherever he went he made good friends among both good men and bad men and men of high and low degree, and they were always ready, any of them, to offer a helping hand if they thought he needed it. That he lived those days with zest and gusto is quite sure from the relish with which he has written of them now in his old age.

Dr. Hoyt was a Minnesota lad, son of a prosperous farmer, who decided that he could not afford to give the boy all the education he wanted, but was willing to permit him to set out in the world in his middle 'teens to earn the necessary money. First came two years as a rodman in surveying parties along the northern frontier, most of the time with the government expedition surveying the boundary line between this country and Canada, and both these experiences provided adventures, perils and exciting incidents in plenty. Then, having decided that he wanted above all things to be a physician, he spent his next seven years earning money, studying medicine, practicing, doing more studying, until finally, in the early '80s, he was ready to settle down as a sure-enough doctor. He spent some of this time at Deadwood, when that mining town was at its liveliest, and he tells some entertaining yarns about his experiences. But the custom of dying with boots on was so prevalent there that a young medico's practice was not lucrative, and so in the Autumn of 1877 he set out for the Southwest and spent the next four years in Texas and New Mexico.

In that region he met and made friends with most of the famous bad men of the border. On one page of illustrations appear photographs of Jesse James, Frank James and Cole Younger, all of whom he knew, or met, at one time or another. At Las Vegas he enjoyed a very pleasant dinner with Jesse James and Billy the Kid. Pat Garret was one of his good friends, and their friendship continued for a long time. For three years, until the outlaw's death, he knew Billy the Kid well and found him interesting, likable and capable. Billy was a mere boy, only 18, when they first met, but already he had won fame in the Southwest as leader of a gang of rustlers and killers. Dr. Hoyt mentions, however, that one of the things that made him friendly with the outlaw was the fact that they were both teetotalers. He thinks there is no truth whatever in stories about the Kid's drinking, but says that his men made up for his abstinence. Later in New Mexico Dr. Hoyt tried to persuade him to cut loose from his bad associations and lawless activities, go to some other country and start afresh in a reputable life, for he felt then and still feels that the young man could have won success anywhere, so capable was he and so winning his personality. Governor Lew Wallace also made the same effort, and at one time Billy was almost persuaded, but changed his mind, and not long afterward, when he was only 21, met death at the hands of Sheriff Pat Garret, having himself killed twenty-one men. Dr. Hoyt gives an interesting picture, which he thinks is from the only existing photograph of Billy the Kid, whose name was really William H. Bonney.

The much-desired dollar proving very elusive in the Southwest, Dr. Hoyt tried his hand at whatever occupation became possible. He practiced medicine sometimes; he had quite a long and interesting spell of employment as a cowboy; once, when he was flat broke and nothing else could be found, he took a job as bartender, at which he seems to have been particularly successful, because he never drank; he served as assistant postmaster; he was a vigilante at one time; he owned and ran a drug store. But wherever he was and whatever he did he enjoyed life, and was constantly meeting people who were interesting for one reason or another and taking part in events that were excitingly characteristic of the place and the time. He carries on his narrative, but more briefly, through his after life, with especial attention to his services as chief surgeon during the Spanish-American War and in the Philippines. He has now retired from practice and lives in Southern California, where, at the age of 75, he still finds life desirable and enjoyable.

the photographer, both amateur and professional, an understanding of the processes, methods and aims which will give a better artistic quality to his work. It is a thoroughly practical book, with little or no airing of theories, but with constant attention to how and why each process and phase of the work must be done to achieve the desired result. The chapters on lenses, cameras, exposure, development, printing, treat their several subjects with less attention to processes—with which the author assumes his readers to be already familiar—than to the aim of securing artistic results and the methods by which this can be accomplished. When Mr. Young comes to such subjects as lighting, composition and treatment of sitters he brings in the principles of art which the student of painting must understand and use, and with much care and detail shows how and why they should be applied in photography. In a chapter of notes on the treatment of the head he insists that the photographer should have a sound idea of the construction of the head, and to help in realizing this shows how its rendition in painting has been evolved through many centuries. There are chapters on the photographing of landscapes, architecture, pictures, sculpture and other things, and on backgrounds and mounting and framing. Those on retouching and on altering values briefly discuss reasons and principles and give extensive advice and counsel as to materials, methods and processes. The book is copiously illustrated with seventy-five page plates which elucidate points made by the author and almost as many drawings in the text.

ESKIMO LIFE

AN ESKIMO VILLAGE. By Samuel King Hutton. Illustrated. 156 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company.

THE village about which Dr. Hutton writes is the missionary station and Eskimo village of Okak, on the island of Kivalek, off the northern coast of Labrador. He has worked there as a medical missionary for so many years that he has come to know the place and its people as an open book. The Eskimos are his friends and he likes and respects them and feels toward them a deep and warm affection. In his first chapters he describes with simple realism the place as it is today and then goes back to its beginnings a century and a half ago, the pathetic but fruitless first attempt to establish a mission on the frozen shores of Labrador and a little later the coming of a Moravian missionary of Saxony, Jens Haven—"the great name," says the author "in the Labrador Mission" — who established the village of Okak and left a tradition and a memory still revered.

But most of the book is filled with chronicles of the village, vivid sketches of its men, women and children, incidents of their daily life, little stories of life and death and love among the Eskimos, colorful descriptions of scenes and climate. It is all written, of course, from the viewpoint and out of the heart of a missionary and quite often the author insists too much upon a point of sentiment or of pathos. But for the most part it is done with the utmost simplicity and with a stark realism that makes his pictures vivid and alive. His simply realistic pen has caught the spirit as well as the appearance of the village and its Eskimos so that the reader both sees and knows them. He even makes one understand their deeply rooted love for their bleak and forbidding home land. In an especially touching tale, which brings out this devotion, Dr. Hutton tells of meeting an Eskimo of middle age just returning to Okak after twenty years or more of absence, during which he had sailed on ships and traveled on land, always working, and so had seen many lands and great cities. But, always the memory of Labrador was with him, and so at last he had come home, because, he said, "Labrador is the best land of all." With smiling pleasure he polished his gun, bound his new harpoon with thongs, delighted his palate with the flavor of raw seal meat, learned to hunt again. Soon he married an Eskimo girl; they built their little wooden hut with their own hands, and he settled down in the village, after all his wide ranging of the world, happy and thankful to be at home again.

A VARIED COLLECTION

AN EDITOR'S SCRAP BOOK. Compiled by Almet S. Moffat. 182 pp. New York: Almet S. Moffat. $2.

MR. MOFFAT has been a newspaper man for sixty years and during that time he has collected from his exchanges a very great number and variety of pieces of verse and prose which seemed to him worth keeping. These "scraps" which he, as he phrases it, "found floating about in the great sea of journalism," he has winnowed to select those of most value and to those chosen for his book he has added selections from the scrapbooks of friends covering a hundred years, and, finally, he has augmented the collection thus made by a few favorite extracts from the works of famous authors. The result is a unique collection, a real "scrap-book" of bits of sentiment, humor, fantasy, satire, pathos, information, eloquence, high imagination, deep feeling, superficial frivoling. They range from excerpts from letters received during the World War by the War Risk Insurance Bureau to Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, from Shelley's "Ode to a Skylark" to a group of limericks, from Ben Franklin's "On Marriage" to the New York Sun's famous editorial of many years ago on "Is There a Santa Claus?" and from Lincoln's favorite poem, "Oh, Why Should the Spirit of Mortal Be Proud?" to the old "Rock-a-by, Baby" song. Mr. Moffat has indicated authorship whenever possible, but most of his "scraps" are still the floating waifs they were when he found them.

OUR CELESTIAL NEIGHBORS

ROMANCE OF THE PLANETS. By Mary Proctor. Illustrated. 272 pp. New York: Harper & Bros. $2.50.

MARY PROCTOR, capable daughter of her famous astronomer father, the late Richard A. Proctor, while she has added nothing to the astronomical knowledge of the time, has done a work of great usefulness in her interesting books for lay readers in which she breaks the solid loaf of science, which would be for them quite indigestible, into the appetising fragments which they can understand and appreciate. She has written half a dozen books that put into popular form the history, the facts, the recent conclusions and speculations concerning the heavens, of which this new one is the fourth in a series dealing, respectively, with the Romance of the Sun, the Moon, Comets and the Planets. The volume is rich with information presented in an interesting way and sets forth simply and clearly the recent discoveries and revelations made by scientists.

When THOMAS EDISON groped in the dark

IN 1859 Edison was a newsboy on the trains in and out of Detroit. He spent every hour he could spare in the public library "grappling bravely with a certain section, and trying to read it through consecutively, shelf by shelf, regardless of subject.

Admirable determination! Edison was destined to be well read, just as he was destined to become the greatest inventor of all time. But his early desire for fine reading was a blind groping in the dark. The books in a modern public library would take fifty lifetimes to read!

Now everyone can be well read

Just as America's great inventor brought light into the world through the great medium, electricity — America's great educator brought light to everyone through the medium of good reading. Dr. Charles W. Eliot, from his lifetime of study, selected the pure gold from the world's literature. Into a single set he assembled the essentials of a liberal education, the books that everyone must know to be well read. In the Five-Foot Shelf are the carefully selected writings of 302 immortal authors.

Carlyle once said, "If time is precious, no book that will not improve by repeated readings deserves to be read at all." Time nowadays is more precious than ever before. We cannot, like young Edison, attack the countless shelves of public libraries. Probably none of us possess the persistency and patience which guided his early reading. We must have only the really great literature, the books that make us think straight, talk clearly and increase both our power to success and our enjoyment of life.

The Harvard Classics answer these requirements to the last detail. Already they are read and cherished in thousands of cultured homes. They are constantly bringing keen enjoyment and deeper understanding into busy lives. "Reading," as Edison himself says, "will never take the place of doing, but it enables us to travel twice as far with half the effort."

Notes on Current Magazines

HARPER'S for December is full of good things. First of all, there is a story by Elizabeth Madox Roberts—or the beginning of a story, for it is to be continued. As in "The Time of Man," the locale of the story is in the Southern mountains. Miss Roberts's clean, fresh-minted style—the simplest words in the best order—makes her central idea, that of the effect of the discovery of a pot of money upon a poor white couple, beautifully clear in its unfolding. It is too soon to judge the story, but the indications are that it will be on a par with Miss Roberts's "Death at Bearwallow," which was one of the good things in the first American Caravan.

"This Question of Birth Control" is Dorothy Dunbar Bromley's contribution to the December Harper's. It is Miss Bromley's idea that "if all of the men and women who practice birth control were to give" current attempts at repealing the Comstock law and attempts to legislate in favor of the spread of information and clinics "their active backing they would be passed in no time." Miss Bromley agrees with those who see the unchecked growth of population as the prime motivator of modern ills. She quotes liberal clergymen in support of her thesis.

In "The Future of the Great City" Stuart Chase summarizes for Harper's readers the positive, or pleasurable, reactions to be gained from living in New York City, and the negative, or painful. The pleasurable reactions include "Fifth Avenue below Fourteenth Street, where fine old houses and a ghost of dignity remains"; "inside block gardens," "the view of the city from a high roof garden, particularly at night," "bars of sunlight under the elevated railroad," "cube masses against blue sky," and "the Bronx River Parkway." Negative reactions include "a feeling akin to being at the bottom of a well," "Park Avenue and its apartment houses like so many packing cases," "the gentlemen with no immediate purpose in life around Times Square," "the huddle of skyscrapers around the Grand Central—the big bullies"; "all trucks," "jammed traffic," and "the ripping open of streets—like a public operation."

Mr. Chase develops his idea of "technological tenuous," which he has already touched upon in "Men and Machines," by giving illustrations of what happens when a main nerve (such as a water main, a gas main or a subway) is cut. It is his belief that in a city like New York, with its congestion, its tremendous supersurface development, there can be no adequate inspection of the main underground nerves, and that, with the aging of steel, a catastrophe is likely to come upon us at some indefinite moment that may not be so far in the future. Mr. Chase believes that we might prevent Megalopolis from drifting "olindly into breakdown," but for psychological reasons we probably shall not. "The job would have to be done with the same high-handedness and vigor which characterized the War Industries Board when, overriding a thousand encrusted traditions and petty rights, it put the nation on a war footing. A perfectly ruthless civic will must operate. Tear down a square mile here, a square mile there. Obliterate this reeking slum. Double the width of this street; abandon and build on that one." By this time, as Mr. Chase notes, the reader is probably smiling at the forthright attack on Megalopolis. But not Mr. Chase. He sighs: "When I think of the city fit for the high gods to live in which modern engineering might build * * * when I think of what Megalopolis might be * * *"

The growing army of humanists, whether they follow Bishop Potter or not, will be interested in Harry Emerson Fosdick's article on "Religion Without God? The Limitations of Humanism." Albert Jay Nock in a paper on "Officialism and Lawlessness" argues that the average man can only resist the incursions of bureaucracy by "keeping the officials in a state of constant fear—not fear for their jobs, but fear for their skins. * * * Only where the disposition of a people is either complaisant or 'inattentive,' or both, can officialism make any headway against their liberties." Mr. Nock believes that there is a distinction between "a law and a statute; between a law and an ordinance; even between a law and a constitutional provision."

The American Mercury for December prints an article on "Whitman as His Own Press Agent," by Emory Holloway, which bolsters the attack of the late Harvey O'Higgins upon the poet as one who never missed an opportunity to call attention to the existence and excellences of "Leaves of Grass." Mr. Holloway prints notices of Whitman culled from The Washington Chronicle and The Washington Evening Star of seventy-five years ago, some of which were apparently directly inspired by the poet, and others which were apparently written by him. "In one or two cases," says Mr. Holloway of the notices evidently written by Whitman of himself, "we have not only internal evidence as guide, but the copy in his own manuscript." It seems that Whitman, to make headway against ridicule and indifference, "found it advisable to act as his own press agent. Accordingly, he explained his new verse, not only in a classic preface to the poems themselves, but also through anonymous reviews in various newspapers."

The pity of it is, remarks Mr. Holloway, "that he felt he had to advertise himself or go under; and that, if he must be his own press agent, he injudiciously called attention to his worst poetry as well as his most sublime."

If Whitman resorted to Machiavellian tactics to put himself and his poetic doctrine across, and Mr. Mencken chooses to laugh at the subject and print Mr. Holloway's article in The Mercury's pages, that is all well and good. But some day, say fifty years from now, when Mr. Mencken is under investigation himself, a savant will exhume the December, 1929, issue of The Mercury and put Mr. Mencken's review of "The Life and Letters of Stuart P. Sherman" under the microscope. With an innocent air of merely attacking the life of Sherman as an objective fact, Mr. Mencken blandly takes all the credit in the world to himself for being the prime mover in Sherman's desertion of the campus. It is a piece of artful advertising that Whitman could never have approached in subtlety.

Prohibition continues to be a major question (which is all right with us just so long as it is kept out of the realm of humorous writing). Current History for December prints former Senator William Cabell Bruce's discussion of "What Substitute for Prohibition?" and also "Benefits of Prohibition in Pennsylvania," by Harry M. Chalfont, anti-saloon leader. Senator Bruce takes up the various plans offered for amelioration of the present situation. He disagrees with the plan offered by Franklin Chase Hoyt to repeal the Volstead act and substitute a law defining the "intoxicating liquors" mentioned in the Eighteenth Amendment as "distilled" liquors, thus leaving the way clear to beers and wines and ales. The human appetite for spirituous liquors cannot be legislated out of existence, in the opinion of Senator Bruce, and the Hoyt plan would therefore not do away with the evil of the bootlegger. The plan of Dr. F. W. Buck, however, is considered as something better; this provides that the Eighteenth Amendment shall be amended to allow Congress to provide for the manufacture and transportation of intoxicating beverages, and the sale thereof, under a system of restrictions, provided that no permits shall be issued therefor in any State whose laws prohibit liquor. Then there is the Nicoll plan: Senator Bruce thinks this has its own special merit, although he prefers the Buck. The Nicoll plan provides for the amendment of the Eighteenth Amendment to read: "Except as authorized by Congress, the manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors * * * is hereby prohibited." (That seems to amount to simple cancellation by a phrase.) The du Pont plan receives a friendly glance from Senator Bruce, for it suggests that the Eighteenth Amendment be amended so as to provide for its continued working "until one or more States shall have established a system of State-wide control, whereupon it shall become inoperative in such State or States."

As for Mr. Chalfont, he is of the opinion that prohibition has resulted in the relative freedom of judges from dictation in his home State of Pennsylvania. "In no county," he says, "is there any more a wet group able to approach a conscientious lawyer and say to him: 'You cannot be judge unless you first make terms with us.'" "Fitness for the bench is now the dominant issue."

"Mussolini's Seven Years" are summed up by Carleton Beals in the same magazine. Mr. Beals is more than fair to Fascism. His warning is nevertheless that "unless Mussolini seizes upon the proper moment to broaden the powers of political control and permit freer expression of the popular will, political transition can only be effected by future revolutions and convulsions which would undermine most of his constructive efforts."

James Joyce is on the tear again. In Vanity Fair for December David Cort gives an 'open-minded review of the great Irishman's forthcoming book, a titan's revolt against language," under the heading of "James Joyce's What-Is-It?" Mr. Cort concludes that if the Joycean "work in progress" tries to "master the vocabulary in which are couched the terrible and inaudible mutterings behind the curtain of the mind," it does it very badly. "Glimmers of something intelligible and good come slanting up, but one continues to feel the initial error that vitiates it all." "Literature can never be pure art in the sense that music and painting can be pure art; it must lamentably make sense * * * its advancement is governed by the body of educated readers, beyond whom the experts cannot go too far and whom they can never utterly leave." Mr. Joyce's logic may be good, but the effect is bad.

Transition, whose Fall issue has just crossed the Atlantic from Paris, is, of course, right in back of Joyce. In its present issue Robert Sage and Stuart Gilbert, proclaiming the "revolution of the world," remark that since language is always changing to fit new needs, there can be no logical objection to such experiments as Joyce is making. In Mr. Gilbert's opinion, "the Revolution of the Word" is a movement to explore the secondary, not-utilitarian function of language, to treat the aura, the "light vapour which floats above the expression of the thought," as material for art. Which seems logical enough if vapour is all you are after.

In the December issue of the North American Review Louise Maunsell Field writes on "Sentimentality à la Mode." It is Miss Field's argument that "confidence in the completeness of our disillusionment" is the pet sentimentality of "us moderns." This sentimentality shows in our reading preferences for books that revel in "kitchen grease and drudgery."

A CHRISTMAS STOCKING OF EVERYMAN VOLUMES

Perhaps most of us have ceased to hang our stocking on Christmas Eve. It is a fine old custom that—on this eventful night—the children reserve for themselves. We grown-ups are now devoting much time and energy to the thought of gifts which our friends will enjoy—A simple solution is, and always will be, GOOD BOOKS. Can any gift be of more permanent satisfaction or can any gift more graphically reflect our good taste and consideration in choosing it? EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY has placed practically all of the world's literary masterpieces, more than 300 volumes of "the books that will never die," within reach of every man's purse. Beautifully printed, uniformly bound. Edited by Ernest Rhys in conjunction with Chesterton, Masefield, Lodge, Saintsbury, Swinburne, etc.

Authors whose works are found in EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY

Dickens, Poe, Keats, Austen, Thackeray, Hugo, Carlyle, Shelley, Balzac, Ibsen, Shakespeare, Hawthorne

Sold separately at 80 cents per volume.
Ten of the most popular titles.

German Letter

quote a favorite phrase of Rodin's. Rilke clung to this principle as to a savior. He wrote his marvelous book on Rodin, a work of love and profound understanding, however, Rodin was unable to read it; the two men were separated by a difference in language.

ONCE, during a brief absence, he wrote to the master also, asking a question he had not dared ask face to face—the most important question of all—the question of how one should live. And that great, simple, straightforward spirit could answer only: "Work, and have patience."

Fleeing from Paris, whose atmosphere was oppressive for him, the oversensitive poet sought solitude in Italy and Sweden. The letters he wrote to his young wife are no mere inconsequential gossip; they are perfectly fashioned works of art which we read reverently, absorbing their beauty as if they were poems.

Rilke returned to Paris in September, 1905, intending to spend a week with Rodin. Rodin suggested that the young poet become his secretary—probably with the intention of curing Rilke's soul by his own method, work. Rilke lived in a little house in Rodin's garden, and had time for his own work. Like the sculptor, the poet hoped to begin a new life; his letters of that period overflow with happiness. They give some charming descriptions, for example, of Bernard Shaw's sittings for his bust. But that which was meant to bring the sculptor and the poet closer together became the cause of their final separation. In the noisy, disorderly household with its tremendous, intensive activity, Rilke's longing for the accustomed solitude of his own work grew stronger and stronger. Perhaps Rodin saw that he was suffering; and perhaps the dreamy, ever-thoughful poet irritated him. He dismissed his young friend—in none too tender fashion, it would appear. Rilke's last sorrowful letter to the master he adored says that he no longer has the right to reveal his heart to one he would not be permitted to see again.

It is hardly a tragedy, but merely a melancholy confirmation of the fact that highly talented people of distinctive personality never can endure intimacy for long no matter how many fine things they can give each other.

GABRIELE REUTER.

Thomas Mann's Essays

of mediumistic phenomena which we have read.

There remains a third essay, "Frederick the Great and the Grand Coalition," a brilliant recapitulation of a phase of history which is strikingly in the manner of Strachey's productions of this sort—especially his "Voltaire and Frederick the Great." Mann sheds as much light as history allows upon the motives of that vastly improbable but historically genuine Seven Years' War, which brought modern Prussia into being against tremendous odds. Mann's ironic analysis of it as, on Frederick's part, a "defensive" or "offensive" war, which has bothered historians, is admirable. The enigma of the king himself he attacks by elaborating upon Rousseau's epigram on Frederick: "Il pense en philosophe et se conduit en roi."

Though perhaps the least important of the three essays, "Frederick" is important (as well as delightful) for revealing a further and unexpected side of Mann's multilateral mind. The variety of interests it reveals here, together with the degree of philosophical and literary insight it exhibits, puts the critic on the same high plane with the novelist.

Notes on Rare Books

THE books and manuscripts gathered together by the American Art Association-Anderson Galleries for auction on the evenings of Dec. 16 and 17 are of such extraordinary quality as to mark this the outstanding sale of the advancing season. The fact that this fine material was assembled from several private libraries at the present juncture has led to uneasiness in certain quarters. Is this "distress" selling? is the anxious question being asked by collectors who fear a reflection in the book market of the recent decline in security values. Happily for all concerned there is no evidence here of any such forced liquidation and the sale offers little encouragement to the bears. As a matter of fact, we have it on excellent authority that at least one of the important consignments was arranged for long before there was any hint of "bad news" in the Street. But in another sense the sale is certainly a makeshift. With no valuable private collections looming on the auction horizon, with no prospect of another Hagen, Jones, Clawson, Chew or Kern sale, for a while, the auctioneers are hard put to it to make up a sale from a number of sources sufficiently important to keep the season alive. Unless they can repeat their present performance at reasonable intervals it looks as though many collectors will have to fall back on the book shops for sustenance.

MEANWHILE, turning to the catalogue before us, we are a little dazzled by the brilliance of the pieces described. Only 374 of them, but they will make history. They are listed under separate alphabets for each consignment, not a very handy arrangement for reference, but the catalogue is redeemed somewhat by a helpful index of outstanding pieces. Moreover, the descripitions are excellent and the generous number of quotations and reproductions of letters and title pages make this a catalogue well worth saving. The chief contribution from the collection of Eustace Conway is the celebrated "Ashbourne" portrait of Shakespeare, so called by its acquisition in 1847 by the Rev. Clement Usill Kingston, then Second Master of Queen Elizabeth's Free Grammar School at Ashbourne, Derbyshire. This handsome, three-quarter length oil portrait has been the subject of much controversy and documents in support of its authenticity are included in the sale. From the library of Vicomte de Lantsheere is offered a complete set of the Kelmscott Press books among them being the Chaucer in a special white pigskin binding by Claessens. The collection of the late Professor Edward Standford Burgess yields several autograph letters of the highest importance, such as one of Keats to an intimate Devonshire friend, written during a dark hour when he finds he must buffet the world alone, and echoing Wordsworth's "Intimations of Immortality"; one of Poe to Fitz-Greene Halleck, soliciting a contribution for "The Southern Literary Messenger"; another, of Maria Clemm, his mother-in-law, an appealing letter relating to Poe's literary remains and the contents of his lost trunk; and a fragment of a letter by Shelley to his publisher, hastening the printing of "Laon and Cythna."

BUT these letters, rare and fraught with so much human and literary interest as they are, are exceeded in merit by another small group, described as the property of a New York gentleman, which contains one of Cooper listed as "superb," perhaps as fitting a designation as any for the quality of scorn it heaps upon his notable contemporaries like Irving, Scott and Dickens. Then there is a splendid critical letter of Poe again, to F. W. Thomas, a novelist, mentioning the first number of his "Penn Magazine"; another to Thomas including a translation of a cryptograph; and a third stating in no uncertain terms his reasons for quitting "Graham's Magazine". "My reason for resigning was disgust with the namby-pamby character of the magazine—a character which it was impossible to eradicate—I allude to the contemptible pictures, fashion-plates, music and love tales. The salary, moreover, did not pay me for the labor which I was forced to bestow." Besides these there is an apparently unpublished two-page manuscript of Poe, being a critique of the works of William Gilmore Simms. The rest of this valuable collection comprises letters concerning Poe, of especial importance being the one of his sister Rosalie claiming a share in his estate and at the same time recognizing the claims of Mrs. Clemm.

It is not generally known that the chair occupied by Lincoln in the Ford Theatre the night he was assassinated was a rocking chair. Yet here it is, a black walnut rocker, with back, seat and arms upholstered in red damask and a catalogue description of two pages which dramatizes the tragedy all over again. It is offered as the property of Mrs. Blanche Chapman Ford, together with the play-bill Lincoln held in his hand at the time, the cord that held back the curtain of his box, and one of two copies of a photograph of the box, together with seven authenticating documents and letters. From another source comes a remarkable two-page letter of Lincoln, written in December, 1860, to Henry J. Raymond, editor of THE NEW YORK TIMES, in answer to certain questions posed by a Southern correspondent, in which Lincoln declares that he has not pledged the ultimate extinction of slavery, that he does not hold the black man to be the equal of the white, that he never did stigmatize the Southern white people as immoral and un-Christian. There is space to mention a few more pieces in this unusual sale. They are the autograph manuscript of a child poem by Lewis Carroll; a first edition of Shakespeare's "Poems"; Hawthorne's "Fanshawe" in original boards; the only extant copy of the suppressed fifth volume of "The Yellow Book" with Beardsley's plates; first editions, some inscribed, of Galsworthy's earliest books, such as "From the Four Winds," "Jocelyn," "A Man of Devon," "Villa Rubein," "The Man of Property" and the rare "The Island Pharisees" of which perhaps but three copies are known; a collection of books and pamphlets of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries together with a few rare incunabula, notable among this group being a "Gulliver's Travels" and a copy of Moses Wickham's "The Utility and Advantages of Broad, High Wheel-Carriages" bound with Jacob Rowe's "All Sorts of Wheel-Carriage Improved"; the original manuscript of Washington's farewell orders to the army; and the rare second issue of Boswell's "Life of Johnson."

WE see in the sale of first editions of American and English authors conducted by Charles F. Heartman at Metuchen, N. J., an indirect result of the merger of the two leading New York auction houses. Although the sale took place last week and the catalogue unfortunately reached us too late to be mentioned before, the character of the event, inaugurating as it does a new outlet for this kind of sale in the vicinity of New York, and the importance of some of the books sold, justify this belated notice. Mr. Heartman has long been a familiar figure in American auctions, but his sales have been hitherto devoted to Americana. Last week's excursion into the more popular field of modern first editions he describes as an experiment, to be followed by similar sales if it prove successful. The catalogue lists 683 books, most of them first editions of nineteenth century authors, brought together from three private libraries. Despite occasional contradictions the descriptions of the American first editions are the best examples of bibliographical research in this field since Wakeman, and make the present list an admirable supplement to that historic catalogue. The analysis of the problems connected with "Uncle Tom's Cabin," appended to a copy in original cloth is one of the most competent and intelligent we have seen. Other features of the sale are first editions of "The Last of the Mohicans," "Fanshawe," "Knickerbocker's History of New York"; "Walden"; and long runs of Cooper, John Davidson, Emerson, Bret Harte, Hawthorne, Holmes, Irving, LeGallienne, Longfellow, Poe (books as well as magazines), Shaw, Stevenson, Swinburne, Tennyson and Whittier.

Brief Reviews

full page illustration in bright colors featuring the tree itself in a landscape and in the foreground a spray of its leaves, another of its flowers and a specimen of its ripe fruit, while an inset at the bottom pictures a little square of its bark. Facing the illustration is part of a page of text describing the outstanding characteristics of the tree and telling very briefly the uses to which its wood and products can be put. There is no attempt to give classifications or scientific nomenclature, or, indeed, any but the simplest information. The punctuation and the proofreading are both rather deplorable.

ENGLISH COTTAGES

THE COTTAGES OF ENGLAND. A Review of Their Types and Features from the Sixteenth to the Eighteenth Century. By Basil Oliver. Foreword by the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin. Illustrated. 91 pp. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $7.50.

THIS beautiful book ought to have a strong appeal for those who know and love the English countryside. It is the outcome of a movement in England, initiated by the Royal Society of Arts, which during the last three years has been enlisting adherents, raising money and rousing enthusiasm for the preservation and protection of beautiful old cottages. Its executive committee asked Mr. Oliver, who was already taking an active part in the work, to write this book. He has restricted its scope, because of the wealth of material at hand, to England alone and to cottages only, or houses of purely cottage type. Its chief attraction and interest for American readers are the full-page illustrations that have been beautifully reproduced from what must have been strikingly fine photographs of cottages and hamlets representative of the centuries included. There are almost a hundred of these plates, which are supplemented by many fine drawings in the text of details and features. Mr. Oliver describes them all with appreciation, backgrounding and diversifying his text with brief mention of historical or social connections and extracts from old and modern authors. He has classified his descriptions according to materials and methods of building and the illustrations according to counties.

Stefan Zweig has completed a biography of Fouché, the French Terrorist who became Minister of Police. The book is a best seller in Germany. It will be published here in the Spring by the Viking Press.

One of the most extensive analyses of trade statistics ever offered to business men and economists. Discussing the stabilization of trade, this book considers the extent to which American business can be pre-planned on the basis of advance orders and whether inventories have been increasing or decreasing. Both of these questions have an important bearing on the probabilities of industrial depression following the recent stock market collapse.

are privileged to announce a limited and signed edition of

THE STREAM OF HISTORY

by Geoffrey Parsons

Chief Editorial Writer of the New York Herald Tribune

[in four beautiful volumes]

HISTORY from a modern position—related as a stream whose source as well as its ending is unknown. These volumes are distinguished particularly by the extraordinarily high qualities which come from the largeness of the author's vision, his sanity and his sense of proportion. They are printed at the Scribner Press on beautiful silkote paper. Each volume is profusely illustrated from copper half-tones. There are sixteen illustrations made from four printings, which are attractively mounted. The fourth volume has four additional illustrations. Each volume is finished with a lining paper designed especially for this edition. The binding is imported hand-made Japan paper sides, cloth back, leather label, stamped in gold. Beautifully boxed. Limited to 500 copies for sale. Signed by the author, numbered one to five hundred.

Subscriptions will be filled in order

CRITIQUE of LOVE

Dr. Fritz Wittels has explained Freud's theory of the dominating power of sex so plainly and simply there is no longer any reason for not understanding it correctly. There is no reason, either, for considering sex as a terrifying or loathsome disease.

by FRITZ WITTELS

Dr. Wittels is an eminent Viennese psychoanalyst, disciple and biographer of Freud. His discussions of sadism, masochism, bisexuality, and narcissism, of love and marriage, of the modern child woman, will clarify in your mind the sanity of sex. $3.50

OLD LOUISIANA

By Lyle Saxon

Author of "Fabulous New Orleans," "Father Mississippi," etc.

In this book Lyle Saxon sets down in his own vivid and inimitable fashion the chronicle of a glamorous and romantic section of our American civilization which is fast crumbling into the dust of decay. He takes the reader back into the grand old days when the true aristocracy of Louisiana graced the beautiful and stately old plantations. Illustrations by E. H. Suydam. $5.00

Queries and Answers

This department is designed to assist in the location of complete versions of poems and their sources, the names of authors, &c., which cannot be found through the usual channels of anthologies and books of reference. THE TIMES receives a great many more queries than it can publish. It endeavors, therefore, to select those of the greatest general interest. Queries should be addressed to the Editor of Queries and Answers, New York Times. They should be written on one side of the paper only, and must contain the name and address of the writer as evidence of good faith. Requests for poems that appear in these columns must be accompanied by postage.

QUERIES

"On Sounding Skates"

G. A. S.—Wanted, the name of the author and the poem of which these lines are a part: "On the sounding skates a thousand different ways, the then glad world is maddened all to joy."

"Falling Waters"

M. I. M.—Wanted, the poem entitled as above, written by a soldier in the Civil War. It begins:

Comrades, heard ye not that gun?
It echoes near the setting sun;
And, see the smoke of battle loiters
O'er the plains of Falling Waters.

"Franklin on Pewter"

R. B.—Requested, the location of a remark made by Benjamin Franklin about pewter. It was something to the effect that the use of pewter was economical.

"The Actor's Gift" "The Artist"

A. J. R.—Desired, the name of the author and the source of these quotations:

This is the actor's gift; to share
All moods, all passions, nor to care
One wit for scene, so he without
Can lead men's minds the round-about.

And also this one: "Not by indolence nor by self-indulgence, but by the absolute possession and mastery of his personality will the artist be able to raise himself to the supreme glory of men whose lives are all creation, all labor and all enthusiasm."

"The Grandams Blanket"

J. M. A.—Wanted, the name of the author and the poem containing these lines:

They took the grandams blanket,
Who could not say them no.
They took the baby's cradle,
Who could not say them no.

which appear within a few pages of the end of Kipling's "Captain Courageous." So far as I know, they are not by him.

"Nothing But a Rose"

H. H. B.—Wish the name of the author and the poem that contains these lines: "It was nothing but a rose I gave her, nothing but a rose, any wind might rob of half its savor, any wind that blows."

"Whom Life Shall Cure"

B. M.—Requested, the poem by Kipling, the first lines of which are: "Live thou whom life shall cure almost of memory. * * *"

"The Service of My Love"

H. D. R.—Desired, the complete poem by Cecil Spring-Rice in which these lines occur:

I vow to thee, my country, all earthly things above,
Entire and whole and perfect, the service of my love.

"As the Billows Fling Shells"

B. L. W.—Wish the name of the author of the poem of five stanzas, enclosed herewith, the first of which is:

As the billows fling shells on the shore,
As the sun poureth light on the sea,
As a lark on the wing scatters song to the Spring,
So rushes my love to thee.

"Satan's Flowers"

N. H.—Requested, the source of this quotation: "Satan's flowers turn to ashes."

"Companionship of Books"

R. D. H.—Wanted, the name of the author of this quatrain, which was thought to be by Professor Curtis Hidden Page, but he recently wrote me that he cannot claim authorship to these lines:

Thou fool, to seek companions in a crowd!
Into thy room and there, upon thy knees,
Before thy book-shelves, humbly thank thy God
That thou hast friends like these.

"Dim Tracts of Time"

G. W.—Desired, the author's name and the title of this quotation:

Dim tracts of time divide the far-off years from me,
Thy voice comes strong through years of change;
How can we follow Thee?

Also wish to know the author of these lines, which are from the "Songs of the Sons of Jaffir," translated from the Persian, "The Sword, the Name, and the Song."

I know of a land that knows a Lord
That is neither brave nor true;
And I know of a sword, a sword, a sword,
That can cut a chain in two.
Its edge is keen, its blade is broad;
I know of a sword, a sword, a sword,
That can cut a chain in two.

"Syrian Skies Look Down"

J. C.—Wanted, the author's name and the poem containing these lines: "For hence lies in the lorn Syrian town and on his tom with shining eyes the Syrian skies look down."

"Dignity"

I. H.—Wish the source of this quotation: "Dignity is a mysterious carriage of the body to conceal some defect of the mind."

"Wind, a Finger on the Pane"

D. F.—Desired, the complete poem by Maynard, entitled "Stories," beginning: "The wind is a finger on the pane; the moon, a ghost across the snows."

"Bells of San Gabriel"

F. A. W.—Wish a copy of the poem by Charles W. Stoddard, entitled as above.

ANSWERS

"Changes in Despair"

MISS INNA MINGAN HARDING, Pittsburgh, Pa.—I enclose the poem wanted by A. R. in your issue of Nov. 24. The lines wanted occur in the second stanza.

WHEN BURBADGE PLAYED
(To L. B.)

When Burbadge played, the stage was bare
Of fount and temple, tower and stair;
Two backswords eked a battle out;
Two supers made a rabble rout;
The Throne of Denmark was a chair!

And yet, no less, the audience there
Thrilled through all changes of Despair,
Hope, Anger, Fear, Delight, and Doubt
When Burbadge played!

This is the actor's gift; to share
All moods, all passions, nor to care
One whit for scene, so he without
Can lead men's minds the round-about.
Stirred as of old these hearers were
When Burbadge played!

By Austin Dobson (1840-1921).

"The High Road and the Low"

Mrs. H. C. MARMON, Mowrytown, Ohio—The lines

Oh, ye'll tak' the high road and I'll tak' the low road,
And I'll be in Scotland afore ye,
But me and my true love will never meet again,
On the bonnie, bonnie banks of Loch Lomond, asked for by N. P. H. Nov. 17, are the chorus from the Scotch song "Loch Lomond," a copy of which I enclose. The author's name is not known. It may be found in the "Golden Book of Favorite Songs" and in "One Hundred and One Best Songs" and "Heart Songs."

A number of readers answered this request, many of whom sent the song, which begins: "By yon bonnie banks, and by yon bonnie braes, where the sun shines bright on Loch Lomond." The song is said to have been composed under the following circumstances: One of "Bonnie Prince Charlie's" soldiers was taken prisoner at Culloden and carried to Carlisle, where he was sentenced to death. His sweetheart visited him the night before his execution, and in talking with her he said that she would go home by the high road, but that his spirit would travel by the low road (to the grave) and reach Scotland before she did. The music is a variant of the old Scotch air "Kind Robin Lo'es Me."

"Meek and Lowly"

Mrs. CHARLES G. VASSAR, Flushing, N. Y.—I enclose the poem wanted by E. H. L. in your issue of Nov. 17. The name of the author was not given by this correspondent.

CHARITY

Meek and lowly, pure and holy,
Chief among the "blessed three";
Turning sadness into gladness,
Heaven born art thou charity.

Pity reigneth in thy bosom,
Kindness reigneth o'er thy heart,
Gentle thoughts, alone can sway thee,
Judgment hath in thee no part.

Hoping ever, failing never,
Tho deceived, believing still;
Long abiding, still confiding,
To thy Heavenly Father's will.

Never weary of well-doing,
Never fearful of the end,
Claiming all mankind as brothers,
Thou dost all mankind befriend.

Miss Sarah E. Halsey, New York; Julie Anderson, Auburn, N. Y.; Mrs. Mary Hunt Warner, Northampton, Mass., also sent the poem. The latter tells us that it was written by Charles Jeffreys and set to music by Stephen Glover. It is one of many songs in a forty-year-old portfolio called "Music." Stephen Glover, an English composer, was born in London in 1812 and died in 1870.

"A Believing Heart"

NATHALIE W. HOMANS, Newport, R. I.—The lines, "But when their tales were done, there spake among them one, a stranger, seeming from all sorrow free," wanted by R. K. N. Nov. 17, are from the fifth stanza of the poem "Losses," by Frances Brown. It contains six stanzas in all, and begins:

Upon the white sea-sand
There sat a pilgrim band,
Telling the losses that their lives had known,
While evening waned away
From breezy cliff and bay,
And the strong tide went out with weary moan.

Miss Mary E. Burt, Fall River, Mass., also sent the poem and this information about the author: Frances Brown was born in Ireland about 1818. Her father was the postmaster of Stranolar. When only 18 months old an attack of smallpox deprived her of her eyesight. So the development of her poetical faculty under this deprivation is a remarkable instance of the triumph of the spiritual nature over physical obstructions. A volume of her poems was issued in 1847. A pension of £20 a year was settled on her by the government. She died in 1864.

It is contained in Bryant's "Library of Poetry and Song," No. 14 of "One Hundred Choice Selections," and other volumes of verse. E. E. Cassels, Pottsville, Pa., also sent the poem.

"An Old Man's Story"

Miss LOUELLA D. EVERETT, Boston, Mass.—I send a copy of the poem wanted by W. T. E. (Nov. 24). It consists of sixteen eight-line verses, the first ones being those desired. The author's name is not given.

Feeble and old an old man stood,
'Mid a careless, boisterous crowd;
His face bore the look of solitude,
His form with years was bowed.
"Come stranger," cried one of the merry throng,
"Drink with us, this Christmas Day;
Tell us a story, or sing a song,
To pass the time away.

KEEPING PACE WITH SCIENCE

Sixteen distinguished scientists will help you choose the vital new books of scientific interest.

YOU are living in a scientific age. Science not only has remade the world, it continues to remake it. Men of intelligence are looking to science for guidance in building a better world.

By providing you each month with the outstanding current volume of scientific interest, the Scientific Book Club helps you keep abreast of this scientific progress.

The editorial and advisory committees of the club, comprising sixteen distinguished scientists, weed out for you the most worth while volumes from the hundreds of scientific books published annually. You no longer need to waste time and money on books which have little intrinsic value.

The term "scientific" is not used in any narrow sense. From the many branches of science, including astronomy, biology, chemistry, physics, geology, anthropology and psychology which today find literary expression, the distinguished editorial committee of the Scientific Book Club will select for you the most important and interesting books. This committee consists of:

Dr. Kirtley F. Mather, Professor of Geology, Harvard University, Chairman of the Editorial Committee.
Dr. Arthur H. Compton, Professor of Physics, University of Chicago.
Dr. Edwin G. Conklin, Professor of Biology, Princeton University.
Dr. Harlan T. Stetson, Professor of Astronomy, Ohio Wesleyan University.
Dr. Edward L. Thorndike, Professor of Educational Psychology, Teachers College, Columbia University.

Dr. Kirtley F. Mather

Dr. Arthur H. Compton

Dr. Edwin G. Conklin

Dr. Harlan T. Stetson

Dr. Edward L. Thorndike

The advisory committee of the club is a body of eminent scientists and writers, including Ralph Barnum, Julia W. Brown, J. McKeen Cattell, Alice Hamilton, Vernon Kellogg, Robert K. Livingston, Robert A. Millikan, Forest R. Moulton, Arthur A. Noyes, Michael I. Pupin and Harlow Shapley.

Some of the most brilliant scientific minds of the nation will suggest to you what they deem to be the outstanding scientific book each month. In the Scientific Book Club Review, which you will receive each month, is a complete analysis of the selected book, together with descriptive comments of other volumes of scientific import. Should you prefer the book of the month you merely await its arrival. If, however, the book of the month does not appeal to you, you have the option of selecting any book from the supplementary list. You may notify us your choice in the club by noteping at least six books during the year.

NO DUES, NO FEES.

Membership in the club entails no expense other than the cost of the books. There are no dues, no fees. As a member you receive, at regular intervals and attractive prices, new volumes selected with discriminating care by a committee of eminent scientists. You receive each month, without cost, the Scientific Book Club Review, which criticizes the selected book and describes other worth while volumes. You pay the Scientific Book Club exactly what you would pay the publisher or bookseller plus a few cents postage, and you are reading the book before the general public is aware of its publication.

Fill out the attached coupon. Membership enables you to buy when, as never before, with the great onward march of science.

SCIENTIFIC BOOK CLUB,
20 Lafayette Street,
New York, N. Y.

Please enroll me as a subscriber to your service. I am not committed to take more than six books during the coming year and I agree to notify you promptly during any month in which no book is wanted. The price of the book sent to me each month is to be the publisher's price, plus postage. A bill is to be sent with each book and I agree to pay it within 10 days of receipt. If I am dissatisfied with the service, I reserve the privilege of cancelling my membership at any time after giving you 30 days' notice.

UNDERSTANDING THE STOCK MARKET

A mine of practical Wall Street information. It avoids opinions and discussion; it gets right down to facts. It answers the many questions in your mind:

What is an odd lot, a short sale, a warrant, a stop-loss order? How can a customer check his broker? What are call loans, margins, puts and calls? These and the thousand and one other terms and operations which go to make up the fascinating methods of the Stock Exchange are treated completely and authoritatively.

A list of Stock Exchange symbols, a complete index and a glossary of terms help make this a useful reference book for every trader. $2.00

THE FABIANS CONQUER BRITAIN

After Forty-six Years of Street-Corner Debating and Persistent Pamphleteering, a Handful of Socialists Find Themselves, Through the Labor Party, Leading Actors on the Political Stage

By HAROLD CALLENDER

LONDON.

BEFORE an audience that filled a large hall in Kingsway one night recently, a tall man with a big head, a thin voice and a dry humor introduced Professor H. J. Laski, who dealt with the House of Commons in a brilliant but very disrespectful manner and disposed summarily of the House of Lords by prescribing its abolition. The tall man was Lord Sankey, the Lord High Chancellor, who holds the highest judicial office in the kingdom and consequently bears the traditional designation of "Keeper of the King's Conscience." He was presiding at a lecture of the Fabian Society, which for nearly half a century has devoted itself assiduously to the task of abolishing—very gradually and gently and judiciously—the present social system.

Next to the Lord Chancellor sat a benign-looking patriarch whose black suit accentuated the snowy whiteness of his hair and beard. He sits there at all the Fabian lectures, and the last one of the series he delivers himself. On this particular evening he said not a word; but at the close of the lecture he leaned over the edge of the platform and helped collect the questions, written on odd-sized bits of paper, which were passed up from the audience to the Lord Chancellor, who carefully smoothed out each sheet before giving it to the lecturer.

This venerable revolutionary was George Bernard Shaw. He happens (incidentally) to be the most renowned of living dramatists, and as he sat upon the Fabian platform his latest play was being presented to a full house in the West End. But, as he himself has put it, he got his start in Hyde Park with a cart and a trumpet—that is, as a soap-box orator—and he likes the fact to be remembered. Shaw was an ardent Fabian long before he won distinction as a playwright; he still is a Fabian and he can seldom quite forget it, even when writing a play. He doubtless has devoted more time during the last fifty years to writing devastating pamphlets and to making Socialist speeches in all the corners of London than he has devoted to writing plays. One sometimes suspects that he wrote his plays largely for the purpose of attaching to each one a sort of Fabian tract in the form of a long preface, and he probably is actually more proud of his essays on Jevon's theory of value and of such chefs d'oeuvres as Fabian Tract No. 116 (entitled "Fabianism and the Fiscal Question") than he is of being the author of "Candida."

So this genial veteran sits in Kingsway Hall not as G. B. S., the successful dramatist, but as G. B. S., the successful Fabian—as one of the brilliant pioneers in a long intellectual and political tussle which has made it possible for a Labor Government to take office in Great Britain. Old Fabians remember the time, forty years ago, when Shaw was greeted with a rain of stones and bottles as he mounted his soapbox in London streets; today he sits beside the "Keeper of the King's Conscience" and thousands pay to hear him speak, while many come just to see him sitting there.

At the entrance to the hall a bookstall offers an array of books and pamphlets—Fabian tracts, Shaw's plays, biographies of Kingsley, Owen, Morris, Ruskin, Bentham and Mill, even a book of Socialist songs. Among them is a volume entitled, "The Decay of Capitalist Civilization," written a few years ago by Sidney and Beatrice Webb, two of the most noted of the Fabians. Sidney Webb, the sage of British socialism, now sits in the House of Lords with the title of Lord Passfield and, as Secretary of State for the Dominions and Colonies, administers a good share of the empire—though his wife, a distinguished Fabian and scholar, who for decades has enjoyed a singular political influence, has declined the honor of becoming a mere peeress.

After forty-six years of patient, persistent pamphleteering, of debates and reports on all manner of social questions, the Fabians have at last come into power. It would scarcely be an exaggeration to say that the British Empire is governed just now by Fabians. A former Fabian is Prime Minister and twenty members of the Fabian Society hold posts in the present government, eight of them being in the Cabinet proper. In the Fabian lectures this Winter, which were presented under the general title "Social Evolution: the Next Ten Years," one sensed an air of confidence which seemed to say: "The next decade belongs to us and it is time to consider what we are going to do with it."

The Fabians are the encyclopedists of British socialism. They have done the library-grubbing and the manifesto-making for the Labor party. They have compiled carloads of statistics and drawn up hundreds of reports and programs. They have written books and electioneered and "propaganded"; they have made speeches on street corners, in trade-union halls, in slums and in drawing rooms; they have lectured and organized and entertained; they have strewn the British Isles with facts and arguments. They have devoted their superior talents and education to the double purpose of supplying the working classes with a reasoned program for the realization of their aspirations and of convincing the "brain workers" and the middle class generally of the desirability and practicability of "the reorganization of society by the emancipation of land and industrial capital from individual and class ownership and the vesting of them in the community for the general benefit."

The Fabians have never been numerous. They were slightly more than two hundred in 1890 and they number only about two thousand today (most of them being listed in "Who's Who"). But their influence, thanks to their exceptional ability and industry, has reached far beyond the British Isles. Many an American student, in the last forty years, has come upon the "Fabian Essays in Socialism" (edited by Bernard Shaw) and has been impressed by their scholarship and lucidity, if not convinced by their arguments. Never has the case for socialism been more effectively presented.

Though they wanted a completely reorganized society, the Fabians were not in a hurry. They knew it would be a long time in coming and were prepared to wait and to work for it in the traditional British manner. In practice they differed, and still differ, little from hard-working Liberals. So they named their society after Quintus Fabius Maximus, who knew how to wait when he was warring with Hannibal.

But this did not prevent them, in the beginning, from being gay and militant revolutionaries. Shaw, one of the gayest and most militant, has described the Fabian temper of the '80s and the transition it underwent in consequence of the Fabians' sense of humor and their British practicality.

"The Fabian Society was warlike in its origin," he said. "It came into existence through a schism in an earlier society for the peaceful regeneration of the race by the cultivation of perfection of individual character. Certain members, modestly feeling that the revolution would have to wait an unreasonably long time if postponed until they personally had attained perfection, set up the banner of socialism militant, seceded from the regenerators and established themselves independently as the Fabian Society.

WE denounced the capitalists as thieves and, among ourselves, talked revolution, anarchism, labor notes versus passbooks and all the rest of it, on the tacit assumption that the object of our campaign—with its watchwords, 'Educate, Agitate, Organize'—was to bring about a tremendous smash-up of existing society, to be succeeded by complete socialism. And this meant that we had no true practical understanding either of existing society or socialism. Without being quite definitely aware of this, we yet felt it to a certain extent all along; for it was at this period that we contracted the invaluable habit of freely laughing at ourselves which has always distinguished us, and which has saved us from becoming hampered by the gushing enthusiasts who mistake their own emotions for public movements. From the first, such people fled after one glance at us, declaring that we were not serious.

"Our preference for practical suggestions and criticisms, our impatience of all general expressions of sympathy with working-class aspirations, not to mention our way of chaffing our opponents in preference to denouncing them as enemies of the human race, repelled from us some warm-hearted and eloquent Socialists, to whom it seemed callous and cynical to be even commonly self-possessed in the presence of the sufferings upon which Socialists make war."

So the Fabians, without departing from their principles, became sobered by experience. They soon ceased to bother about such ultimate and academic questions as the ideal currency for a Socialist State and plunged into intense study of economic theory and such timely subjects as unemployment, the eight-hour day, municipal ownership, public markets and poor-law reform. They became recognized authorities and nobody dared to say any longer that they did not know economics. If the Labor party, in its early days, wanted an expert report on almost any conceivable social question, it had only to send word to the Fabian Society, and Sidney Webb, who is almost omniscient in this field, would draw one up over night.

The Fabians continued to "educate, agitate and organize," but they did so in their own way. While others were getting up unemployment demonstrations, they were digging in the library and sharpening their wits at debating societies. They founded the Hampstead Historic Club, which became a class for historic study, each student taking his turn as teacher. They delivered lectures and wrote tracts on all sorts of social questions.

Shaw has told how he "haunted all kinds of hole-and-corner debates and public meetings and made speeches at them." "Every Sunday," he says, "I lectured on some subject which I wanted to teach myself; and it was not until I had come to the point of being able to deliver separate lectures, without notes, on rent, interest, profits, wages, Toryism, Liberalism, socialism, communism, anarchism, trade-unionism, cooperation, democracy, the division of society into classes and the suitability of human nature to systems of just distribution that I was able to handle social democracy.

ALL our best lecturers have two or three old lectures at the back of every single point in their best new speeches; and this means that they have spent a certain number of years plodding away at footling little meetings and dull discussions, doggedly placing these before all private engagements, however tempting. A man's socialistic acquisitiveness must be keen enough to make him actually prefer spending two or three nights a week in speaking and debating, or in picking up social information in the most dingy and scrappy way, to going to the theatre or dancing or drinking, or even sweethearting, if he is to become a really competent propagandist."

If the Labor party, which is nearly twenty years younger than the Fabian Society, has at last been able to form a government, with the help of middle-class votes, it owes its success to a great extent to its middle-class allies, the Fabians, who have done such effective axe-work.

For the Fabian Society is eminently British, not only in its patient opportunism and its undogmatic practicality, but also in its class consciousness. Egalitarian though it be in its philosophy—Shaw going so far as to advocate absolute equality of income—the society is a strictly middle-class body and its members are "put up" and elected, as in an exclusive club.

The Fabians are professional men and women—writers, journalists, teachers (including numerous professors at Oxford and Cambridge), physicians, lawyers, former army officers, members of the higher

AS BARNARD'S DEAN DEFINES EDUCATION

Miss Gildersleeve Says the Value of College Training to a Girl Lies in the Development of Her Mental Powers

By S. J. WOOLF.

ON Morningside Heights stands a group of six or eight large buildings which house Barnard College, a part of Columbia University. Thirty-three years ago all of Barnard College was contained in an old brownstone dwelling on Madison Avenue, and its present head was attending classes there. What had been bedrooms served as instruction rooms. The old long front parlor and the former dining room were sufficiently large to be used as the assembly hall for all of the students.

The student who became the dean was born in New York, the daughter of a well-known judge. It has been the lot of Virginia Crocheron Gildersleeve not only to witness a radical change in the status of women, but also to be connected with a woman's college during the time that change was taking place.

The New York of her girlhood was the New York that Edith Wharton has written down. While Miss Gildersleeve was still attending college, people were wondering how Harper's could dare to publish Trilby. Yellow horse cars still jangled on Madison Avenue and the nearest approach to jazz was "There'll be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight."

Her youth was the age of the Gibson Girl. Then the room of no young woman was complete without a pen and ink copy of "The Last Day of Summer," one or two pennants with large Y's or H's on them, and photographs of William Faversham and James K. Hackett. Anthony Hope and Richard Harding Davis were the favorite novelists, and many a tear of sentimental pleasure was shed over the poems of James Whitcomb Riley.

When Miss Gildersleeve graduated her class wore puff sleeves and bell skirts under their gowns. Pompadours and huge knots of hair were but partly hidden by the mortar-boards. The skirts of the members of the last class which Dean Gildersleeve recommended to receive their diploma came barely below the knees. Caps fitted well over bobbed heads and not only the dress was different.

"In the intervening thirty years," said Miss Gildersleeve recently, "a vast change has come in the methods of education and in the attitude of the people towards education for women."

SHE was in her office in the college. Large windows opened on Grant's Tomb, the Union Theological Building and Riverside Drive. On the office walls were photographs of graduating classes. The office itself is strictly businesslike in appearance. No feminine touch disclosed the fact that its occupant was a woman.

And yet Miss Gildersleeve is distinctly feminine. She is tall and graceful and there is a charm about her manner which no amount of collegiate formality can chill. In pose and poise as well as in speech she is above all else natural, and thirty years of teaching have neither dimmed a sense of humor nor closed her eyes to what is going on outside of the college walls.

Her black bobbed hair, in which an occasional gray strand shows, is brushed almost carelessly away from her broad forehead. But it is her eyes which are her most characteristic feature. They are dark brown, heavily lidded eyes which, though soft, are sparkling. They are shaded by tremendously heavy raven black eyebrows. She has the kind of eyes and eyebrows that Balzac and DeMaupassant have so often described. Indeed there is something decidedly French about her appearance, about her wide sensitive nostrils and her high cheek bones. In contrast, however, is a thin-lipped mouth, which, though it is prone to smile, is almost ascetic in its sensitiveness. The upper part of her face might be that of a French actress, the lower that of a New England schoolmarm.

A physiognomist might say that Miss Gildersleeve is a person of contradictory nature—understanding but judicial, tolerant but obdurate, sympathetic but inflexible.

"Thirty years and even a less time ago people used to say," said Miss Gildersleeve, speaking of the changes that have taken place in the general attitude toward education for women, "'isn't it too bad that Mary is not using her education now that she has got married and has three children?' Now they are beginning to realize that a college education can be used in a home with a husband and three children and in meeting just the ordinary duties of citizenship. What the women's colleges are trying to do is to give a liberal education—not the training for any one special profession, but a general development of mind and spirit.

"After all, it does not matter very much what particular subjects a student takes up. In fact I believe the teacher counts for more than the subject. The other day I heard a mother say that her course in algebra had helped her more than any other in making her home. Not because she could discover the value of 'x', but because algebra had taught her precision, exactness and swiftness."

I asked whether the elective system had proved a success. Her dark eyes sparkled, the severity of her mouth melted into a smile.

"Do you honestly believe any girl of 16 or 17 knows whether physics or chemistry will be better for her to take? A supervised elective system is all right, but the supervision is necessary. I have known three great teachers in my life. The first was Professor Basil Lanneau Gildersleeve, a cousin of mine, who had the chair of Greek in Johns Hopkins University; Professor Charles Frederick Chandler who taught chemistry at Columbia and Professor James Harvey Robinson of the history department who was up here on the Heights.

"It was not that they taught Greek or chemistry or history better than any one else. It was that in teaching their subjects they gave their pupils a broad and wider knowledge of the world itself. We Americans are too much inclined to think that the only way to learn anything is to 'take a course in it.' The result is that you hear people talking about courses that should be given in dinner table conversation, or in telling bed time stories to children or in washing clothes or in any number of other subjects which any competent person ought to be able to master for herself.

"It is not the specific things that a girl gets from college training that count, but the general development of her mind and powers and interest. Most girls who go to college are helped there to think straight. That is tremendously important, to think straight, to get at the real point of a question, and not to be led astray by all sorts of consideration and details that don't matter, not to be taken in by false statements and bunk.

"Another thing that a girl learns at college is how to find out about things—how to take some strange subject and learn what she needs to know about it, not just to skim over the surface of it but to discover the essentials."

Miss Gildersleeve believes, however, that there is a side of college life for the girl other than that presented by the courses she takes. Clubs, plays, debates, college papers, give her experience in organizing, in executive work and in developing social poise.

"Most girls," she said, "never get, outside of college, a chance to know and to work with a great variety of types of people. The opportunity at college is very valuable, particularly as the girls are both rich and poor and of all races and creeds."

As I asked her whether there was the same college spirit today as formerly, a high-powered motor whizzed past.

"When I went to college," she replied, "we did not have those. Our lives were very simple compared with the lives of girls today. There were theatres, a few parties and vacations in the Summer. Some of the families of the girls had horses and carriages, but a ride around Central Park was all that that meant.

In those days a midnight fudge party was wild dissipation. So was a Welsh rabbit cooked in a chafing dish. Now, I ask you, what would either of these mean to a girl of today? There are so many things she can do it is hard for her not to divide her interest. So many of the girls have social engagements of their own that it is difficult to fill the hall for even an important speaker."

I asked whether this was also true in the boys' colleges.

"Indeed it is, and even the much-vaunted football has not the pull for the boys that it had some years back. A lot of the interest in it has to be worked up. As a matter of fact these matches between two colleges are one of the things that make for a loss of interest in the college itself. Here at Barnard we play no other colleges in any of the sports the girls go in for. The result is that we have a number of teams in our own college which play among themselves. Incidentally this rule was adopted by the girls themselves.

"And this brings up another subject which is a development of recent years, a thing, by the way, which has worked much better—I don't know why—in women's institutions than it has at men's, and that is student government. It gives students a splendid chance to get practical experience in solving political problems on a small scale and so trains them to play a useful part in real politics after they graduate. I believe that there is an immense opportunity for educated women to do useful work in politics. They have more leisure than the men and they ought to be able to work for the good of the community.

OF course they are new in this field as yet, but I am sure that if they are willing to start at the bottom and learn first the routine of district politics and gradually rise, they will be of immense service to the country at large. The time I have been teaching has been one in which woman's position has changed more than in any other period of the world's history. Economically and politically woman has become independent. Practically every girl nowadays, rich or poor, starts in with the idea of doing something in life after she graduates from college. No longer is the time immediately after graduation looked upon as an interregnum. Marriage is not regarded as a bar to any girl's activities.

"The result is that the methods in women's colleges have been constantly changing. And this is a good thing, not only for the students directly but also indirectly, because these changes are generally arrived at through the efforts of the faculties. And though perhaps a great many people do not realize that teachers are human beings, they are, and a change of method puts new interest into the teaching staff and relieves the monotony of going on year after year in the same old way. And a new interest among the teachers undeniably works for the benefit not only of themselves but of the students.

"We are living in a vibrant age—an age filled with ideas and things undreamed of when I was a student. But despite all this bustle and hurry and materialism, there are things that I learned at college in that unsophisticated period from which today I still derive untold pleasure.

"When I was student I fortunately read a good deal of Greek poetry. It gave me great joy—joy which has lasted all these years. Reading Greek masterpieces was like taking a journey into some very distant and lovely country, and learning there new and exquisitely balanced forms of beauty and new visions of the greatness of the human spirit. Those experiences have remained with me. They can never be taken from me."

THE ELUSIVE TRAIL OF A NEW FASHION

Though Many Factors, Social and Commercial, Help Make Styles in Dress, the Wearer Is the Final Arbiter

By EUNICE FULLER BARNARD

FASHION says that skirts are longer and the waistline is nipped in. And suddenly like blackbirds swarming at the breath of Autumn, 100,000,000 women from Oslo to Buenos Aires, from Melbourne to Miami, descend upon the ready-to-wear shops. In city lofts other thousands bend frantically over their power machines. Anxious shopkeepers thumb over last season's stock, and there is not a manufacturer of leather or lingerie, stockings or hairpins, whose hopes do not brighten or fade at the news.

In deepest Alaska the missionary's wife, listening over the radio, rips again at the hem of her 1925 mail-order frock, while in Sioux City the department store buyer who has guessed wrong finds herself without a job. Here and there a growing group of feminine insurgents fills newspaper columns with defiance. But after all, who is there to be praised or blamed?

To the businesses made and unmade, to the thousands alternately fed and starved through fashion's whims, to the millions of women who spend long hours succumbing or compromising, or defying, fashion is still the hidden Moloch, as powerful, as intangible, as unpredictable as the weather or the stock market.

By a paradox the more worship of fashion has grown, the more inscrutable fashion has become. It was all much simpler and more understandable two centuries or so ago. Then fashion followed the nod of the king and his court, and Louis might truthfully have parodied his famous remark to read: "Le môde, c'est moi." And if the corsetières and the textile makers were not satisfied, there was at least a definite place of appeal. Only the aristocracy and the wealthy tried to follow fashion at any rate. The peasants and the tradesmen went on their unchanging ways.

The amazing democratization of fashion has made it at once more important and less easy to find its source. Who is today the arbiter and originator of fashion? Some fifteen years ago Irene Castle bobbed her hair, and three great industries, the hairpin, the haircomb, and the hairnet, eventually almost went out of business. A débutante at Biarritz not long ago knotted a bandanna about her neck and suddenly the scarf neckline adorned the world from Grand Street to Sydney, Australia. An actress stepped ashore from a transatlantic steamer wearing an imitation gardenia in her button-hole. Within a month the artificial flower was on every counter from Fifty-seventh Street to Fourteenth, and was making its way through the ten-cent stores across the continent.

Today fashion is not only eventually democratic. It is more and more instantaneously so. A decade ago a well-known fashion-publishing company issued three different kinds of magazines. One with the freshest styles went to the metropolitan centres. Another, of more conservative tendencies, circulated in Western towns, and the third, featuring the modes of yesteryear, was mailed to subscribers on the farms. Today such a policy would not be possible. The radio, the movies, the newspaper, the magazine advertiser, the airplane, bring fashion's message simultaneously to Chicopee and Chicago. And the millions with increased leisure to observe, and increased wealth to buy, are rapidly putting the Occidental world into ever-changing uniform.

What are the currents and forces that determine that uniform, that make some styles "catch on" and others not? Who first selects the majority of styles that make their way? Is there any clue to the course fashion is to take? Today, with ever larger fortunes at stake, more and more strenuous efforts are being made to find out. Tracing fashion trends has become a business in its own right. Statisticians, high-powered executives and college professors of economics are ranged beside perfumed professional style observers in the hunt. Almost every department store has its highly paid stylist, and great fashion advisory organizations for manufacturer and retailer have sprung up in the last few years. Today as never before Fashion and her trends are becoming a matter of charts and graphs and figures. Science and artistic intuition are neck and neck upon her trail.

Now these big new organizations that make their bread and caviar from advising shops and factories on fashion proceed on two almost opposite theories. They might indeed be termed respectively the aristocratic and the democratic hypothesis of fashion's origin. One school of thought holds that what an exclusive group of women who live in Paris decide to wear, in the main sets the fashion for the rest of the world. And one shop tomorrow will be showing what "the famous forty," as they are called, wore yesterday in the Bois.

The other theory, which pins its proof to statistics, is that the shoppers themselves ultimately do the deciding. Mass acceptance of any style both here and abroad makes it a fashion. Fundamentally it is a matter of crowd psychology and the general temper of the times.

The Paris couturiers, according to this argument, may, as they do, invent every year thousands on thousands of models. The "famous forty" may, as they do, wear hundreds of them. But it is the half dozen of these or others adopted by smart women generally that make the fashion. And what these accepted fashions are and whether they are on the rise or the wane need not be guessed at, but can be measured by actual successive counts. For Fashion, in this hypothesis, has no giddy wheel. She changes slowly and predictably from year to year.

The startling point about both theories is that, while it is generally Paris through her couturiers who proposes, it is woman, either in the individual or the mass, who disposes. Take the first theory. It is an easy and comfortable one, for it leads directly, as all fashion roads ultimately do, to Paris. And in all her three centuries of fashion supremacy Paris has probably never been so generally as now a name to conjure with. The mail-order house, the hole-in-the-wall dress shop, parade their Chanel models, though neither proprietor nor customer may have any idea whether Chanel is a man, a woman or a trade-mark. Everywhere the Paris label in itself holds the glamour of royalty in the fashion world.

With practically every line of copy the American retailer or the manufacturer or the fashion magazine editor "boosts" Paris as the style centre, at the same time he exploits her name to sell his goods. But behind his glib "Paris dictates" are a half dozen genuine influences, psychological, historic, artistic and economic.

Obviously, in Paris the three main factors that go to make a laboratory of artistic costume meet at their culminating point. There admittedly live the world's chief fabric designers, the famous couturiers and the women of all nations with wealth, leisure, chic, social position and inclination to experiment in wearing new styles. In such a free artistic milieu fashion is born.

What perhaps few Americans realize is the immense influence of the great French weavers in the whole matter. The silk and woolen and cotton manufacturers at Lyons and at Lille are creative designers in their own right, and they often employ artists of high rank.

The American garment manufacturer copying French models indiscriminately in all colors and all materials, the home dressmaker cutting velvet and cotton alike from a single paper pattern, have yet to learn that to the Paris couturier the texture values of the fabric itself are often the reason for a mode. New colors, new weaves, new designs in the cloth are bases of new draping.

On the other hand, the French dressmaking world with its pomp and circumstance is the familiar heroine of the American fashion story. It is indeed Paris to the American woman. What she perhaps does not realize is the immense size of it as an industry—the fact that there are 80,000 dressmakers' shops in Paris and that a quarter of all the people work on textiles or women's clothes. What she thinks of, and usually rightly, so far as fashion is concerned, are the few famous designers who make up the haut couture, and whose names are household words around the world.

One or two of them like Worth have dressed the queens of Europe for half a century. Others have sprung into new fame since the war with the flapper mode and its more modern antithesis. Today they have a trade organization, the Chambre Syndicale de la Couture, one of whose avowed objects is the exchange of information on the progress of fashion, but which principally acts as a mutual protective society to prevent the pirating of designs.

The haut couture today represents big business, many of its members having more than 1,000 employes each, and copying en masse their own successful designs. But chiefly, of course, they are the world's professional experimenters in the art of costume. Each of the big houses, it is said, turns out from 500 to 1,000 new models each year, shown at the February and August "openings" with all the dramatic flourish of a first night at a play.

"By a Paradox the More Worship of Fashion Has Grown, the More Inscrutable Fashion Has Become."

First comes the showing of the press, to the newspaper and magazine fashion editors at a kind of evening party; then perhaps a private view to social notables; and finally the main opening. There, admitted only by cards bearing their photographs like international passports, the professional buyers from the United States and other countries sit tense, watching the manikin parade through the more or less gorgeous salons—now taking notes, now rushing forward to snip a bit of new fabric to mail to an employer across the ocean. It is all a frenzied competition, the designers vying to strike the new and the popular, the buyers pitting their judgment against each other to be the first to discover what is best and send it home.

BUT even in this battle it is the woman wearer, the ultimate consumer, who counts. What will she like, what will she accept? Or to ask the question more cynically, how much—or in recent years, how little—can be "put over" on her? For after all, fashion is a business with quantity buying its aim. And the new theory is that it does not move successfully in violent revolutionary ways, but gradually, by engaging variations, preparing the popular mind as it goes. It is rather like evolution in the natural world. The designers constantly create interesting variants of the prevailing theme. The more extreme interpretations often perish, and only the few best adapted to the mental and social environment of the time survive.

Again and again, say the fashion wiseacres, attempts to force the mode unduly have fallen victims to an early blight. Years ago, when the hobble skirt first hitched triumphantly along Broadway, the fabric manufacturers, who suddenly saw their yardage sales drastically curtailed, took fright. They appealed to the Paris couturiers, who evolved a masterly relief measure in the panniered frock. The width of the skirt was to be kept the same, but additional material was to be puffed about the hips. Manufacturers and retailers and advertisers waged a concerted campaign. But still what seemed to the public an eccentric novelty languished in the shops. The mode was off to the svelte and boyish trend, and no amount of insistence could bring it abruptly back.

On the contrary, the present change in the silhouette, they will tell you, has been prepared for little by little for three years. Inch by inch skirts have been descending to the knee and below. Evening gowns have been flounced lower and yet lower in the back, till this year the train dares to appear; and contours—in the advertisements at least—have been rounded ever so deftly, till the corset can be clamped on. Even so, the shops are reporting that neither here nor in Paris are women accepting the extreme forms of the mode. Revolt and modification on two continents show that even this long-prepared change outran popular psychology.

Buyers, it is said, who go to Paris seeking and buying the absolute novelty often come home with slow-moving stocks, and dismissal in the offing. Even the couturiers who create from their inner consciousness, fancy-free, are the ones who most frequently fail. They, too, must be alert in the world, observing what women are wearing to know what they will want to wear next. Sometimes they must take the hint from the amateur. It was a quick-eyed couturier, so it is said, who saw the débutante wearing the bandanna as a scarf at Biarritz, and made it a fashion.

AFTER the couturier has shown his new creations, as many and as different as he dares, comes the part of the "famous forty"—the few women of different nationalities in the smart Parisian world, whose acceptance of a style gives it a long start on its road to popularity. There are titled English women, and Spaniards and Americans as well as Parisians among these forty "best dressed women in the world" who are tracked by the knowing observers from the races at Longchamps and Auteuil in the Spring to the Summer resorts of Deauville and Le Touquet, back again to Paris, and off to the Winter promenades at Cannes or St. Moritz.

What these women select from the new creations are usually the modes, with variations, shown as the assured fashion at the mid-season openings of the couturiers in the Spring and Fall. What they wear is the headline news for the smartest fashion magazines. They are, perhaps unconsciously and unwillingly, official testers of the mode for the world of women. They have the leisure, the money, the inclination and the prestige to experiment where the rank and file of women, wishing only to be in the established mode, would hesitate.

But even with the forty, the statistical school of fashion thought will think, numbers and graphs are what is important. If one of them adopts a style, it may be individually charming, but if half a dozen wear it, it becomes important. And if next week a dozen have taken it up, and the following week twenty, a fashion trend becomes apparent. If, consequently, in ever-increasing numbers it makes its appearance in New York at the smart restaurants, the opera or the horse show the retailer may put his money with some assurance on that mode. The chances are good that it will continue the even tenor of its way from the forty to the four hundred and on to the four million.

What are the psychological and social factors behind this mass acceptance of a fashion? Events like the French Revolution and the World War are an important influence. So are art vogues like that at present for the so-called modern style of decoration, and so are the tastes of the moneyed class, the things that advertise to the world leisure and wealth. When most people were obliged to work on the farm the lily-white complexion was the vogue. Today, when most toilers are shut up in offices, shops and factories, comes the sun-tan fashion.

But in the opinion of most fashion authorities the prevailing influence on the modes of today and yesterday has been the war and the reaction from it. It was the war, they will tell you, with its insistence on the woman of action, the business woman, the ambulance driver, the farmerette, that started the boyish, short-skirted cycle. Now with the fading of the war into the background of history, with more money and more leisure, we are looking toward more gracious ways of life, more femininity, romance, formality. It is this urge, they say, that the new modes express. They have given woman a chance to appear in a new and more decorative guise to man.

So, after all, according to the new theories, it is not primarily the couturier, the advertiser, the salesman, or the much maligned manufacturer, who cruelly forces the fashion, much as they may do to exploit it. As often as not they, too, are its victims. You who would know where fashion springs — cherchez la femme.

OLD EUROPE VIBRATES TO A NEW TEMPO

Germany Marches Forward, France Loiters, Britain Looks to Her Empire

Her Busy Ports Express the Industry of Germany, While in Contrast, Quiet Farms Typify a France Clinging to Old Traditions.

By T. R. YBARRA

ONE of the most fascinating things about travel nowadays through the countries of Europe is the study of how each of them is adapting itself to this post-war world of ours. When the armistice silenced the cannon of the embattled European nations they discovered that, as a result of the great conflict, world supremacy had flown across the Atlantic. They found that it behooved them to adapt themselves as best they might to a state of affairs in which, for the first time, non-European ideals and non-European power were the dominant factors. They found that a new tempo had been set, by the bâton of a new conductor, with which they must get themselves into harmony or cease to figure prominently in the concert of the nations.

For eleven years now Europe has been trying to adapt herself to the modern march—sometimes willingly, sometimes grumblingly, sometimes with such a high degree of reluctance as to make the adaptation scarcely visible at all. Many Europeans think that the march of the time is backward, not forward, downward, not upward, away from, instead of toward, all that is best in life and thought. Scarcely a single one of them, however, no matter how hostile he may be to the manifestations of our day, denies that the New Spirit is, indeed, on the march and that Europe must make up her mind either to play an important rôle in it or relegate herself to a place on the sidelines from which—contemptuously, if you will, but none the less impotently—she may watch modernity marching past her.

To what extent has Europe conformed to the new tempo, the new ideals, the new shift of power? To which extent has she fused them with her pre-war conceptions; with what degree of success has she been able to visualize her position in a world where tradition is constantly flouted, yesterday flung into a corner like a threadbare coat, tomorrow reverenced like a god? These questions come constantly to the mind of travelers in Europe; and the answers to them meet their eyes on every hand so plainly that even the most casual of tourists, dashing through the most hurried of itineraries, may read them at every hour of every day during his European tour.

In the first post-war epoch practically no signs of adaptation to the new world-order were visible in Europe. Europeans remained inclined to talk and think and act as if the war, despite having destroyed old nations and created new ones, had not made any basic change in the world as they knew it. To them, during those years, it was still a world with Europe as its centre, European ideals as its norm, European power as its guiding force.

But soon a change set in. More and more Europeans grasped the astounding fact that a new universe had come into existence, inhabited by new human beings who, instead of sitting at the feet of Europe for lessons, brazenly demanded that Europe sit at their feet and accept as truth their shockingly new and, to Europeans, highly unpalatable—philosophy. Ever since Europeans began to grasp that fact they have been tasting the new philosophy—usually with wry faces—increasing the dose little by little, and at each successive stage of the treatment providing the traveler in their midst with an absorbingly interesting picture of an old civilization trying to assimilate a new one without being submerged by it.

AMONG the European nations the one which is adapting itself most easily and thoroughly to the new state of affairs is Germany. An amazing paradox, surely!—the principal defeated nation of the war finding herself more at home in the world created by her defeat than any one of the nations which vanquished her! Yet, paradoxical though the statement may be, it is true—anybody who has traveled recently in Germany will agree to that. Germany is not only finding her place in the post-war world but she bids fair to shape it to her own advantage, to worm her way into it so effectually and efficiently that, maybe, within a few years, only the United States will be ahead of her. Could the same be said, with any degree of confidence, of Great Britain? Or of France?

Germany is envisaging the world of the present and the future in no spirit of diffidence or hostility. Most of the Germans, having charged up their defeat in the war to profit and loss, are doing their best to forget it. They have made up their minds that there are more ways of getting a place in the sun than blasting one's way to it, clad in shining armor and enveloped in cannon smoke. "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war" has become the German motto.

This strikes the traveler from the very moment he sets foot on German soil. For a defeated nation Germany has got rid of the spirit of defeat with incredible thoroughness. Only a small percentage of Germans consider today something to be devoted to mourning for dead of yesterday; the vast majority of them look upon it as a springboard for leaping into a prosperous tomorrow. There are, of course, "diehards" in Germany as well as elsewhere, but their number is diminishing every day. Whatever a German may be politically, he is—when it comes to the realities of everyday life—an essentially practical person. Germans there are who still dream of progress through miliary conquest, but they are very much in the background; the German in the foreground today is he who is intent on driving the fatherland forward without the aid of bayonet or battleship.

TO this fact is due Germany's impressive series of peace-time victories. She has won a triumph, for instance, in the domain of shipping—visitors to Hamburg and Bremen rub their eyes in wonder at the sight of the busy harbors of these cities, which, at the time of the signing of the Versailles Treaty, a brief ten years ago, were deserted, decaying and seemingly doomed never to win back their pre-war prosperity.

Today they hum with activity. Not has Germany replaced her merchant tonnage, swept from the seas by her defeat until it has almost reached the pre-war total, but she has amazed every other nation and bestowed upon herself an advertisement that could not have been paid for with millions of dollars of propaganda money by launching an ocean greyhound—the Bremen—speedy enough to wrest from the British the "blue ribbon" held by the Mauretania for a score of years. All over Germany the traveler sees posters proudly displaying the Bremen; all over the country he reads articles analyzing the significance of her achievement, and hears conversations in praise of it.

Nor is it on the sea alone that Germany has "come back." The chimneys of the Ruhr are belching forth smoke in a volume almost as dense as that of 1913, the German railroads have been reorganized, new life has been instilled into German business, German cities display an activity of traffic and an air of confidence unique in post-war Europe.

All this is because the Germans, though intensely patriotic, are loath to let patriotism stand in the way of what they consider their advantage. The idea of allowing Germany to be outdistanced by other nations simply because the latter apply non-German methods never enters the average German's head.

There is nothing that a German will not "scrap" if it stands in the path of his progress. If tradition hampers him, down with tradition! If what was sacred yesterday clogs Germany's onward march today, away with outworn sanctity!

That is the spirit behind the Bremen, the spirit that sent Hugo Eckener soaring above oceans and continents, that sped the giant Dornier plane with its 169 passengers aboard, to that epoch-making flight over the Lake of Constance. It is a spirit visible, audible, almost tangible, in every city and hamlet of Germany. Some day the German people may revert to their old belief that cannon are the proper instruments for the achievement of progress. Just now, however, there is scarcely a sign of such a reversion in the whole length and breadth of their land. The vast majority among them, having carefully looked over the situation, have decided that a world at peace offers them quite as promising a field for development as a world at war. And they are applying every ounce of their energy and efficiency to the task of winning a place among the leaders in that world—with a careful eye, by the way, in the choice of methods, on these United States of America.

Cross from Germany into France and you find a far different picture. France has little sympathy with the trend of post-war thought; she looks askance at a world where materialistic and technical development, business and financial expansion, are flourishing to the detriment of beauty and culture and art. Rigidly conservative, thoroughly convinced that they have arrived at such a logical conception of what is good and what is bad that it is bound to outlive all temporary vagaries, the French are fighting hard to remain what they are in spite of the wave of materialism threatening to engulf Europe.

LIKE Canrobet in the Crimean War, when, after capturing a Russian redoubt in the hardest of fights, he saw the signal to retreat, they look quixotically at the crass, hurrying, brutal, businesslike world of today, and remark: "J'y suis, j'y reste!"—"Here I am and here I stay!" Times will change, they feel sure; the world will come full circle again; French ideals, French knowledge of how to live, French manners and methods will come into their own again, stronger than ever.

Therefore, in comparison with what is going on in Germany, the changes wrought in France since the war bear an unmistakable look of superficiality. Whereas the German, in order to be among the leaders in the new world of after the war, is willing to change the very basis of his being, get himself, if necessary, a new philosophy and a new soul, the Frenchman, under the impact of the post-war era, is like a man waiting in a doorway until it stops raining.

To be sure, every visitor to France speaks about Americanization, but those who listen must not forget for an instant that it is a case of the Americanization of Paris not of France. Paris has excellent reasons for presenting a glittering, Americanized surface to the thousands of American tourists who pour yearly into her hotels and restaurants, theatres and shops. To do so means dollars. But even in Paris, even in the "American Quarter" centring around the Rue de la Paix and the Place Vendôme, what lies directly behind the façade of Americanization is as essentially French as it ever was.

Russia, Developing New Industries, Flirts With the Idea of Mass-Production.

Rather than risk being left behind in the post-war world the German is willing to turn himself into an American; rather than turn himself into an American the Frenchman will cheerfully march at the tail of the modern procession—nor will he acknowledge for an instant to himself or any one else that he is not leading it. Therein lies a basic difference between the Germans and the French. The German is a man of flexible ideals, capable of amalgamation with foreign ideals. Not without reason has his country been called the most eclectic of nations. He is not at all bewildered by a world in flux. He constantly balances the old against the new in order to discard whichever he deems unsuited to his ends, and nowadays, it is almost invariably the old that he spurns.

The Frenchman, on the other hand, gazes upon a world in flux with cynical detachment. He is like a man watching the waves pound against a breakwater. "Let them pound!" he says. "In a few hours the tide will reach its height, and then—back the waters will go!" An admirable spirit in which to live, assuming that the world will indeed revert eventually to what it was. But if it does not—well, the Romans went down before a changing world and so did the Spaniards and so did the Germans who listened to the martial commands of Wilhelm Hohenzollern. In any event, whether France has guessed right or wrong, every visitor in her midst feels certain of one thing: the boulevards of Paris will remain among the liveliest and her open-air cafés among the pleasantest places in the world—no matter what kind of world it may turn out to be.

While Germans are meeting the new world-order half-way and Frenchmen are resolutely ignoring it, the British are solemnly regarding it without the German's enthusiasm, yet also without the Frenchman's detachment. The British reaction to the transformations wrought by the war is particularly interesting; the most forward-looking among Britons have decided in their minds that the day of European world supremacy is over, yet they refuse to believe that its passing means the eclipse of Great Britain as a leader among nations. Great Britain, they realize, has a card in her hand such as neither Germany nor France, nor any other European nation, can play.

This card is the British dominions. What matter if world supremacy has passed from Europe beyond the seas, if Britain possesses, east and west, vast overseas commonwealths as much at home in thinking the thoughts of the world of the future as the United States? Is not the life-blood of tomorrow coursing through Canadian veins? Is not the outlook of South Africa that of the dawning new world? Are not Australia and New Zealand striding forward with the confident gaze and stalwart strength of pioneers in a new universe? This being so, argue Britons unshackled by conservatism, Britain must find new life and new blood and new freshness of thought by studying the British dominions, understanding their aspirations, fostering and protecting their development.

"Britain Seeks to Strengthen the Bridge Between Herself and Her Dominions." A Pioneering Scene in Australia.

Photograph by Ewing Galloway.

As a result of such reasoning the visitor to Britain finds on every hand reminders that the British are bent more and more on ceasing to be merely Europeans and becoming, by identifying themselves with their dominions, part and parcel of the new world in the making. Everywhere are signs exhorting people to buy "Empire goods"—everywhere one sees pictures of Australian sheep farms and Canadian wheat fields and South African diamond mines. The newspapers of London and other English cities give more and more space to news from the overseas dominions; at exhibitions, like the great one held recently at Wembly, just outside London, every dominion and crown land and colony of the British Empire receives flattering attention and the idea of solidarity between the mother-country and her far-flung dependencies is constantly and artfully emphasized.

IN the eyes of all those Britons who are not clinging, barnacle-like, to the past, the key to British ascendancy in the world of tomorrow is not an alliance with this or that European Continental power but a new and understanding friendship with the extra-European parts of the British Empire. "Germany's future," said the boastful German Kaiser, "is upon the seas." "Britain's future," says the far-sighted Briton of today, "is beyond the sea."

Just as Britain is seeking to strengthen the bridge between herself and her overseas dominions, Russia is trying for a future place in the sun by bending her gaze on Asia. With Siberia in her possession, Russia is the one European nation controlling an overland route to the Far East. And the Russia of the Soviets is just as intent on capitalizing this unique advantage as was the Russia of the Czars. Forward-looking Russians feel that out of the Orient may come a new Japan, and even a new China, well qualified to hold high position in the new world, and they have been bestirring themselves for years to use this possibility to their own advantage.

Nor must it be forgotten that in still another way Russia is girding herself to play a leading rôle in that world. Despite her present chaotic state, her isolation from the rest of Europe, she is eminently qualified for such a rôle in view of the fact that, as at present constituted, she is essentially a nation with a strong sympathy for what is new and a corresponding antipathy for what is old. Though there are thousands of Russians of the old

RIDDLES OF TIME STILL TO BE ANSWERED

Ruins of a Forgotten Past Remind Us of the Dim Dawn of History

By P. W. WILSON

FLYING as a lone eagle over the forests of Mexico, Colonel Lindbergh has caught a glimpse of certain cities of the Mayas, deserted and in ruins, which for centuries have been hidden from the eye of man. It is a contribution to the mysteries of antiquity, at once fascinating and unusual.

Hitherto, the archaeologist has been a person who, so far from soaring overhead, has preferred to burrow underground. It is thus something of a paradox that the antiquarian who digs with the spade should find so valuable an ally in the aviator whose domicile is the stars.

Yet the dawn of history is still dim. Here and there we clear up a point—that the pyramids of Egypt are the sepulchres of an insane pride, that the round towers of Ireland, with their conical tops, are merely the campaniles or belfries of the adjoining churches.

But what about the sphynx? We may see her majestic stillness in a fuller environment. We may identify her as an early Pharoah, built as an apotheosis into the sungod Harmachis. But this Mona Lisa of the Fourth Dynasty on the Nile is still inscrutable, even in her smile. Her lips are still closed. Her open eyes gaze on the universe but tell us nothing.

Yet we cannot ignore this shrouded past. Everywhere it is pursuing our immediate present. It is hard on our heels. At Montespan, to the north of the Pyrenees, you may see yoked oxen, peacefully drawing their wagons along the lanes of that countryside. Why do men worry about that little river, gushing from its limestone grotto, at which the peasants water their live stock?

But one day, not long ago, there came to the valley a young Frenchman, Norbert Carteret. He followed the river into the grotto, and suddenly was faced by a wall of rock. Stripping himself of his clothes, he dived into the water and under the rock, so emerging into an inner cavern. It was a cavern, not only inaccessible; its existence had never been suspected. For a period of 20,000 years, so it was calculated by geologists, that cavern had been closed to visitors.

What is this telltale flint? What is this roughly molded clay? A bison? A bear? A lion? A tiger? As he sits there, naked after his dip, and watches the shadows dance to the flickering of his candle, it dawns on the intruder that he is looking at the earliest sculpture yet found on this planet. Others, as naked as that French enthusiast, had made of that cavern their studio.

That the barbarism of these paleolithics should have disappeared, does not surprise us. After all, the law of our race is supposed to be progress and, before our very eyes, we can watch the yielding of the aboriginal Australian to the pressure of a white superiority. However fascinating may be the statuary of the Cromagnons and Aurignacians who preceded the Gauls, something is due to Michelangelo.

The amazing thing about oblivion is its omnipotence. Not only does it engulf barbarism but it obliterates civilization. When Lindbergh sighted those Maya ruins, he was proving once more that cultures, continental in scope, may vanish so utterly that they do not survive even in the long memory of vague legend.

In the language of Wordsworth, "the solitary shepherd roves along the plain of Sarum" and is scarcely conscious of "the ghost of time and shadows of tradition." If certain monoliths stand upright, so much the better. He builds his cottages against them and uses them to tether his beasts. To him, Stonehenge is merely a resort for tourists who leave tips, and even by the erudite, the origin of Stonehenge was not seriously discussed, if at all, until the seventeenth century. For a thousand years or more, those stones were as solitary and as speechless as the sphynx itself.

But as we examine these relics, our wonder is deepened. How were the stones carried, often from a distance, and raised to the perpendicular, and lifted as a lintel, one on others? Why did anybody put himself or others to so much toil and trouble?

At this point, the biplane assists the mere biped. To the keen eye of the airman, the surface of this planet, bounded only by the far horizon, is spread as a map. He sees the rivers, oceans, mountains, laid out by nature. But he also discerns the finger-prints of his own race, stamped on the landscape, and he reads these finger-prints like a detective.

Looking down on Salisbury Plain, he sees that the landscape is one of those manuscripts which scholars call a palimpsest. Much of the writing is recent—roads, railways, cathedrals, castles, industries; but if we look more closely, we discern the dim, worn characters of a much earlier inscription.

Around Stonehenge the plowman has, for generations, driven his furrow into some depression or over some hillock. To him it has been merely a detail of the enclosed field. But the airman sees that hillock, that depression as a feature of the area as a whole. He tells us that Stonehenge, as depicted on postcards, is a tiny fragment of what Stonehenge used to be. Beyond the circular earthworks there are long approaches. Nor is Stonehenge unique. A few miles distant the village of Avebury contains a still more impressive circle with approaches, the largest of which we have knowledge.

THE Stonehenge of France is at Carnac in Brittany. For generations peasants carried away building material, but there are still 3,000 boulders left in avenues and built as dolmens. Think of the prolonged and arduous labor that was devoted to these far-flung shrines! See them crowded with vast multitudes of priests, chieftains and people! Watch the slow and solemn pageant; listen to the anthem and prayer. Then recall the astounding fact that to this day we do not know for what purpose Stonehenge was used. Charred bones? Yes, they have been found in holes set in a ring. But a cinder may tell two tales. It may mean human sacrifices on the so-called slaughter stone. But also it may mean cremation. Only the moonlight as it falls on the toppling sandstone can say for certain whether we have here a temple as well as a tomb.

Stonehenge was superseded by something else—Rome, Christianity, the Labor party. The mystery of many cities is that, with nothing to take their place, they were deserted. The ruins seen by Lindbergh are only instances of a widespread phenomenon.

Turn to Indo-China where the River Mekong had flowed for centuries through an unpenetrated jungle. About sixty years ago a French naturalist called Mouhot was searching, as was his custom, for butterflies and humming-birds. Suddenly he found himself on the shores of a lonely lake. Not a liv-

A PROMINENT ACTOR VIEWS THE AUDIENCE

If It Fails to Cooperate With the Cast, Leslie Howard Has Found, "Something Dreadful" Happens to the Show

The place of the audience in the actor's scheme of things is analysed in the following article. Mr. Howard, one of the younger actors and playwrights, has been prominent on the stage here and in England.

By LESLIE HOWARD

AN incredible amount of literature is turned out every day concerning the so-called personalities of the theatre—the actors and actresses, the playwrights, the stage directors, the scenic artists and the producers. But for some mysterious reason the audience, that silent, patient element in the institution of the theatre, is consistently and completely ignored. They are the victims of an age-long conspiracy to keep from them the truth about themselves. But this has gone on long enough, and I am about to propound a heresy. I hereby declare that the first and probably the most significant truth about audiences is that they are much more important than they think they are.

In making this bold statement I am letting out a secret that has been jealously guarded by countless generations of the theatrical profession. The idea has always been to fool audiences into thinking that they were the least important element in the theatre, an element, in fact, which could be (and almost has been, at times) entirely dispensed with. This artful scheme I have now shattered at a blow by informing audiences generally that they are at least five times as important as any other element in the theatre world. In fact, I would go further and announce that a theatre without an audience is not a theatre. Whereas theatres continually contrive to be theatres without actors, playwrights, directors or scenic artists. Or, at most, with the feeblest imitations of those personages.

For this heresy I shall doubtless be excommunicated by the Actors' Equity Association, the Dramatists' Guild, the stage hands and musicians' unions and the American Federation of Labor. But they cannot hurt me; they can only keep me out of work—which I don't like anyway. Of course, when I refer to "audiences" I do not mean the general public to whom producers pretend to pander, but the corporate mass that collects in places of entertainment and pays anything it is asked for the privilege of doing so, and about whom the producers know nothing. To prove the five-to-one ratio referred to above I give the following table of precedence in the order of importance:

1. Audience.
2. Playwrights.
3. Audience.
4. Actors.
5. Audience.
6. Directors, scenic artists, odds and ends.
7. Audience.
8. Audience.
9. Managers.

And now, in case I have induced in the formerly humble audience a braggart spirit, let me hasten to add that there is a catch in all this. This "importance" with which I have endowed the audience is not, as might be supposed, the importance of numbers or of financial support. The fallibility of this has been proved by many subsidized productions—notably the one entitled "The Ladder" a season or two back, which was supported by a wealthy gentleman who did not care whether he had an audience or not, and who finally showed his contempt for their money by admitting the public free of charge.

No, the "importance" of which I write is that of cooperation. The audience and the cast, between them, are responsible for making the performance "go." If either side, for any reason, fails to cooperate, something dreadful happens to the show. So you see, the manager, though he usually does not understand the audience, is highly considerate of them. Quite naturally. They are paying him money to work for them. So think a lot of them. But he does not want them to know too much. That is easily appreciated, I am sure. Now, having exploded this great secret concerning the relative importance of audiences, I propose to go further and tell them more of the truth about themselves, some of it pleasant, some unpleasant, without fear or favor. For instance, it may interest audiences to know that, to the actor, they possess a highly individual collective personality, a personality which varies with each audience at each performance. We have all heard actors say, "The play's all right, but we had a terrible audience tonight," just as a member of the audience will say, "The play's all right, but the cast was terrible." Or vice versa. Occasionally it is vice versa.

When an actor walks onto the stage for the first time in a play he instantly senses the kind of audience that is cooperating—or vice versa—with him. The collective personality of the audience seems to come right out directly the actor comes face to face with his public. He knows at once whether it is a tolerant, or impatient, or interested, or bored, or witty or dull audience. Whether it is prepared to like him or dislike him. He can almost tell its average state of education. Let me give an example of this.

Let us suppose, for instance, that you are an actor in a very brilliant high comedy, and you had a wonderful and witty speech commencing, "Well, it seems there were two Irishmen named Pat and Mike"——. If at this point the audience started to laugh in a body, you would at once know that it was a witty, well-educated, cosmopolitan gathering, and if you were to take a peep at it you would find for certain that the majority of it was in evening clothes. With that kind of audience you would hardly have to finish the speech. In fact, the audience would be so amused that it would never let you finish it.

But if, when you started that amusing speech about Pat and Mike, the audience made no sound, and even at the end when you had passed the point I have indicated, and brought the speech to its excruciating conclusion—if even then the audience gave no evidence of its existence, if any, you would then know that you had a thoroughly churlish gathering which, far from being prepared to cooperate with you, had taken an instant and violent dislike to you. You would probably have to repeat the entire speech twice over, and then it is doubtful if you would get any cooperation. Some audiences simply have no conscience. And some are plain dumb.

Of course an actor can be mistaken in his psychoanalysis of an audience. That clever speech about Pat and Mike might have met with frigid, non-cooperative reception indicated before, and the actor might have hastily put the audience down as collectively churlish and dumb, only to find on closer inspection that they were all in beautiful evening clothes and distinctly elegant in general type. The actor, if he were more discerning, should have known at once that this is a case of intellectual snobbery. That kind of audience is what we call "high-brow," just as the other type is what we call (for want of a more obscure word) "low-brow."

The remarkable thing is that, however it is individually composed, the audience, as soon as it assembles, seems to become endowed with this mob-personality, a personality which is frequently quite at variance with the characteristics of its component members. A person surrounded by grinning faces will laugh at the most indecent jokes, while a gunman, because his neighbors weep, will dissolve into tears at the shooting of an innocent bank messenger. But even more astounding is the fact that, apart from this sort of contagion, members of an audience frequently become afflicted with joint physical ailments. I do not mean things like measles, but definite acute though temporary symptoms.

For example, a perfectly healthy man enters a theatre and sits down with not a trouble in the world. As soon as the curtain goes up it becomes apparent that a number of the audience are afflicted with serious chest and throat complaints. Many are coughing painfully, others are having a bad time with their throats. The diseases spread rapidly. In a few moments the healthy man and many others like him have become afflicted and are coughing as violently as the others. Very soon the place sounds like a sanitarium for consumptives. And yet as soon as the show is over the spectators recover at once. This is known, technically, as a "bronchial" audience. These symptoms are purely superficial. They do nobody any harm except the actors, who are obliged to say a good many of their lines twice over, and so do more work than they are paid for.

Of course there are other pathological varieties of audiences, such as the one which suffers from sleeping sickness, but I am more concerned here with the emotions of the audience than with its medical history. I am merely trying to give examples of the homogeneous quality of the average audience as it is sensed by the actor. I must admit, however, that this unity of personality does not always exist. There are cases when the audience does not seem to be pulling together—when it is, in fact, almost having arguments with itself. One has sometimes observed during the performance of certain abstruse plays like, for example, O'Neill's "Strange Interlude" or Nichols's "Abie's Irish Rose," certain sections of the audience being highly amused and indulging in shrieks of merriment, while other sections, who are regarding the same situations very gravely, turn around angrily and violently hush their more hilarious neighbors.

IN America this is usually the limit of the disagreement among an audience, but in London, particularly on first nights, bickerings between the spectators sometimes reach far more unpleasant heights. There, at the conclusion of a performance, the intelligentsia seated in the gallery frequently indulge in cat-calls, hoots, yells, curses, the throwing of halfpennies and orange pips, while the elegantsia in the stalls, inspired by a violent class hatred, and completely forgetting their evening clothes and their waiting motor cars, shout out dreadful things like "Shut up, you swine," "Damn the louts" and "Canaille!" That sort of thing is very disturbing to those behind the curtain. However, it could happen only in a monarchy and need not concern us here.

I now come to that question, embarrassing perhaps, but not to be shirked, which eventually must be tackled in all sociological studies—the question of sex. In the present work it resolves itself into the query, "How may we determine the sex of an audience?" I have stressed, I think sufficiently, the fact that an audience is a unit, a composite but single personality. What is the gender of that personality? Of course the foolish fellow may say, "Who cares?" But we must go deeper than that. Schools of thought differ on this subject. One school holds that the sex varies with different audiences; that the matinee audience is female, and the evening audience male; that it varies, too, according to the play or the star. Another school insists that the audience is always female no matter how it is composed, another that it is always male. Still a fourth regards the audience as definitely bi-sexual. But they are all wrong. It will have been noticed that in referring to the audience in the singular I have been using the indefinite pronoun. The discerning will have got their clue from this. The audience is "it." The audience has no sex. From the actor's point of view it is an invisible, amorphous mass—with a personality, but no sex, will-

TOKIO BUILDS FOR A STRANGE DUAL LIFE

Architecture of the Remade City Is the Mirror Of Old and New That Dwell There Together

TOKIO.

TOKIO has a soul, and her architecture very accurately expresses it, but there are many contradictions and diversities to lead the eye astray. The city, like her citizens, leads a double life. Here East and West, ancient and modern, feudalism and capitalism, have had to come quickly to terms. It is always an age of transition everywhere, but Japan's swift conversion from an Oriental feudal life to the modern age, typified in architecture by the office block and the factory, makes the traces of her transition unusually violent. Here the ten-story steel and concrete office building stands beside a Japanese house every line and curve of which reminds us that "the Japanese genius touches perfection in small things." The same man inhabits both and finds nothing incongruous in doing so, for this duality of life is the condition into which most Japanese now alive have been born.

The central part of the city, of which the Japanese are naturally, if foolishly, proud, is as American as Los Angeles—with a red brick dash of Victorian England still defying time and earthquakes. It is an importation, Japanese only in the sense that St. John's Cathedral in New York is American. But this architecture of twelve-story packing cases pierced with innumerable windows of the same shape and size is interspersed with Japanese buildings which have been left until their owner is rich enough to build in steel and concrete. Sometimes, moreover, an architect whose standards are adrift has embellished a modern building with a tiled cupola or a temple gateway. The result is that, while downtown Tokio seems to the Japanese to be almost purely American, it strikes the American as strongly Japanese. His eye misses the familiar contours of the office block and rests on the restaurant or the tea-house that has chosen to retain its native form.

I am writing this article in the centre of Tokio in a building which you might truthfully say has, architecturally speaking, neither shape nor form—a plain rectangular structure which could be dumped anywhere in the Western United States overnight without being noticed the next morning. But my window at the back looks on a little group of "light framework structures whose tiled roofs are supported on stones with slightly hollowed tops resting on the surface of the soil. There are no walls—at least no continuous wall. The side of the house, composed at night of wooden sliding doors is stowed away in boxes during the day. Semi-transparent paper slides replace the wooden sliding doors during the day time. The rooms are divided from each other by opaque paper screens. The floor is covered with thick mats made of rushes and perfectly fitted together. Furniture is conspicuous by its absence. There are no tables, no chairs, no wash-hand stands, no bedsteads."

I have simply quoted the standard description of a Japanese house, accurate in every particular except that semi-transparent ground glass begins to be used for the sliding doors instead of paper. As the old size and style of divisions in the doors are still preserved the difference is hardly noticeable. Those houses are quite new, yet rather self-consciously old style, and esthetically they are a delight to the eye. They are either tea-houses in which you may entertain your friend with geisha dinners or they are houses in which the geishas live.

Every Japanese leads a double life. He clothes himself with a business suit in the morning and spends eight hours in bank or office among calculating machines, typewriters and filing systems, wrestling with problems of production and salesmanship. But it is not quite the world into which he was born, and when the day's work is over he turns for refreshment of soul to old Japan. The hot bath taken he puts on a kimono sits on his soft floor, eats Japanese foods from a table that looks like a low stool.

IF he goes to the theatre it is to watch a classic drama of love and chivalry, and, much as he enjoys Hollywood, three-fifths of the films he sees depict the adventures of the two-sworded men of whom his grandfather or perhaps his father was one. Every Japanese newspaper carries two serial stories—one of modern life and one of cloak and sword. The Japanese who has checked in nonchalantly at his office or factory in the morning will entertain you in the evening in a room whose style has not changed in three centuries and every inmate of which, from the host in his flowing silk to the geisha who pours out your wine, is attired in the garb you see in Harunobu's prints. These beautiful tea-house buildings, as charming as a color-print and as speckless as a new pin, express old Japan's ideas of splendor, hospitality and beauty and they give today its escape from the machine age. Thus they survive amid the steel and concrete and give the city a distinctively Oriental character.

Old Japan had a beautiful and organic public architecture. It may be seen in the black and white watch-towers and gateways of the Imperial Palace and it is completely exemplified in the castles of Nagoya and Osaka. It lends itself to large buildings and has been used, somewhat flamboyantly but with impressive effect, in the new Kabuki-za Theatre. Its character is distinctly Japanese, and if Tokio had only developed more slowly—in a few centuries instead of fifty years—it might have given Japan a city of noble regularity with an individual and national cachet.

But the change came too quickly. The old architecture could not be readily adapted to the new life Japan was to make for herself in haste, and Japan is consequently without any architecture she can call her own. Her new buildings are, with few exceptions, copies of Western architecture, and being copies they are worse. She has two magnificent banks—the Mitsubishi, severely Greek, and the Mitsui, built and designed by a New York firm on classical lines adapted to modern requirements—but most of her important new buildings are plain, large office blocks which, being without architectural pretension, might be worse than they are. An exception must be made for the Imperial Hotel, designed by Frank Lloyd Wright. Local opinion still quarrels over it and the average salesman who uses it thinks it a freak. It is at least unique, and the first sight by night of its lotus pond and curiously aristocratic entrance is a thrill which the tourist does not soon forget.

The Tokio street scene is fascinating. I have sauntered in the Sierpes of Seville and the Merceria of Venice, and I affirm that the Kagurazaka of Tokio is more picturesque than either. But let us begin as the tourists do by taking a walk on the Ginza, which is Broadway and Fifth Avenue in one. It is broad and straight, lined with gay shops and filled day and night with a lively throng. Night is its best time, for then the mobo (modern boy) and the moga (modern girl) appear in all their glory. He wears a little round hat and a bow tie and a coat that ends well above the level of the chair when he sits and a pair of bags into any one of which his slim body might be slipped. Add a cane, a cigarette and the conviction that he is "it." His moga has her hair bobbed, or in specially bold cases, shingled, a desperate act which stamps her as emancipated; her face is beautifully painted, its native ivory disguised in pink and white, and Cupid's vermilion bow adorns her lips. Of her hat the less said the better; hats are very new in Japan. Her skirt stops at her knees. Like her escort she is the cynosure of every eye and draws reserves of moral courage from the fact.

But despite her inquisitive glance claiming kinship of fashion with the tourist, the eyes of the tourist are on the quietly dressed girls who wear the charming dress of their country. In Summer the correct colors are those of the sky and sea, white and blue. They make a wonderful combination with the pale, clear ivory complexion, the dark eyes and the masses of black hair.

THE living pictures the tourist sees on the sidewalks prevent him from noticing the architecture, and it is as well, for the general effect is as if a Japanese architect after a tour of the world had awakened in Coney Island and proceeded at once to draw elevations. The present Ginza is the fourth in half a century. The first was the old Japanese Ginza dating from before the American Civil War. Then came a street of regular two-story brick houses which owed their form to Victorian England. They were burned—Japan is burned down on an average of three times in a century—or become too small and they were replaced by a street in which every style in Europe and America—and then some—grew up cheek by jowl in two-story structures of lath and plaster.

The fire of 1923 licked them up like stubble, and the present Ginza is five years old. It is more jazzy than ever, the chief difference being that concrete or tin or copper fronts have replaced plaster or wood, and the architectural riot which results from every shopkeeper owning his own small site is partially repressed by an increasing number of typically modern American department stores in steel and concrete. It is best to see the Ginza by night, when its architecture is lost in the soft dark sky that is so close to the roofs of the small houses and when the tourist is conscious of nothing but a lighted promenade filled with gay figures in fancy dress.

The Tokio streets, like the mobo and moga, are not fit to be seen till night. The Nihon-bashi, or Japan Bridge, which Mr. Schutz has drawn for this article, is at the end of the Ginza; the urban landscape is typical of modern Tokio, and the artist's eye has been unusually successful in putting the character of the scene into his etching. That is Tokio and could be nowhere else in the world.

Old and New Tokio; Where Ginza and Nihon-Bashi, or Japan Bridge, Meet.

But there are some bits of unpremeditated town planning inherited from the past which cannot be omitted from any account of Tokio's external appearance. Medieval Tokio was an agglomeration of villages growing around a fortified camp where the administrator of the empire dwelt with retainers and feudal lords encamped around him. It was defended by a triple moat, high earthworks and massive walls. The western semicircle of this moat, shut off by the intervening spaces of the Imperial Palace from direct contact with the city's traffic, is still as it was in the old days. The houses escaped the fire and have kept their Japanese character—fine woodwork, paper windows open to the sun, heavy, tiled roofs grown with weeds. Like Princes Street in Edinburgh, the street has but one side, a moat instead of a railroad fills the ravine, and the far side is crowned not with Gothic buildings but with cryptomeria whose enormous branches stretch over the bank like a giant's arms. To walk around it on a Winter Sunday morning when the sun floods the broad space and the wild ducks are on the water is an exhilarating experience. At the further end rises Kagurazaka, a narrow, steep street of shops with a variegated crowd. At sunset, when the lights come out and the sky is blazing red, to walk up Kagurazaka is like walking on some incredible stage scene.

In September, 1923, the bed of the Pacific slipped like a book at the end of a shelf and a great part of Tokio was destroyed. The citizens were in theory presented with a clean slate on which to build the capital of their dreams. But with nearly a million people to be housed and Winter coming on, the dream city had to take form very rapidly, and the wealth that might have built it had gone up in smoke. New Tokio in many respects, therefore, repeats the faults of old Tokio, and the majority of the new buildings are as little deserving of an architectural prize as the majority of the old.

The late Count Goto, a man of dynamic energy who became Mayor after the earthquake, summoned Dr. Charles Beard from New York to give him expert advice. Very wisely, the reconstruction board decided to concentrate on planning the city instead of attempting impossibilities in rebuilding it with costly structures. The city is now pierced with a number of magnificently dimensioned broad avenues, wide enough usually to allow of four rows of trees and separate tracks for slow and fast traffic. The advantage to trade in the ease of transportation is incalculable, and the city has the further advantage that if another great fire should occur it will be checked by the width of those roadways.

THAT is the first great change due to the earthquake and fire and it is likely to be the most valuable and most permanent. The second is the substitution of fire and earthquake-proof steel and concrete blocks for innumerable old buildings. The third is the replacement of the old narrow bridges by broad, modern steel bridges. Of these six or eight first-class bridges are complete and one or two more have been begun. One hundred and thirty-four smaller bridges spanning the moats and navigable canals have been built, steel replacing wood. Also 203,000 buildings have been rebuilt or removed and reconstructed to suit the new street lines. Fifty-two trunk roads of a total length of seventy-three miles and 121 secondary roads of a total length of seventy-nine miles have been completed. The proportion of road area to built-on area in the new city is 27 per cent as compared with 18 per cent in the old town, a percentage comparing favorably even with Paris or Berlin.

The city has three new parks and fifty-one open spaces covering an area altogether of 106 acres. The most difficult part of the reconstruction of a modern city is unseen and underground. Of the underground reconstruction of gas and electric mains, water mains, sewer mains, &c., 83 per cent has been accomplished. Reconstruction is to be finished next year; its cost will be approximately $413,000,000. It has not given Japan a dream capital, but it has given it the skeleton on which new Japan in time may build an individual architectural style.

THREE VENERABLE JUSTICES WHO REFUSE TO GROW OLD

Holmes, Brandeis and Van Devanter of the Supreme Court Might Retire, but Labor on for Love of the Law

Justice Louis Dembitz Brandeis.

By MILDRED ADAMS

"VANITY," said Justice Holmes at a dinner the Harvard Law Association gave in his honor, "is the most philosophical of those feelings we are taught to despise. * * * If a man's ambition is the thirst for a power that comes not from office but from within, he never can be sure that any happiness is not a fool's paradise—he can never be sure that he sits on that other bench reserved for the masters of those who know."

It was the graceful beginning of implied thanks for the honor done him. It was also an answer to those who wondered, in private conversation and in the public press, why Justice Holmes did not retire from active work and live in peace on the full salary his age and his years of service would have warranted. He was 72 then. He is 88 now, and he has sat behind the pillared rail of the Supreme Court for twenty-seven years, moving up from the end of the row until he sits in the place of honor at the right hand of the Chief Justice.

He is the oldest justice in point of both time and service, but two others share with him the right to retire. To be 70 and to have served the court ten years—that is the requirement. Justice Brandeis is 73 and has listened to cases for thirteen years. Justice Van Devanter is 70 and has marched in the justices' line at the stroke of twelve for nineteen years.

They are amazing men. If you watch them day after day in that austere court room you begin to wonder whether the pattern of age is different for justices, if they have some talisman against the changes years bring to most humans. There is nothing static, nothing finished about them. The picture of a dreaming grandfather lost in his memories and coming back with a start to the realities of life has no place here. These men are alert and intent, keenly alive to every legal statement and all the implications that underlie it. Their knowledge of constitutional law is a vast reservoir constantly at their command. Their attention is focused on the arguing lawyers, their memories are messengers swifter than light, which work at their will.

It is as though the psalmist's wail over the woes that follow after three-score years and ten had no validity for them. They make no secret of the fact that they like their work. They occupy the highest judicial positions in the land. They are like highly skilled medical specialists to whom are brought those cases which are not quite clear, which for some obscure reason do not respond to treatment, which puzzle every one who handles them and test the expert to the utmost.

And therein lies one of the fascinations of being a Supreme Court justice. As one of them said in private conversation, it permits a man to give the best there is in him. It demands the fullest exercise of his powers, and it holds the satisfaction that comes from that inner sense of work done with every bit of skill and knowledge, dexterity and wisdom that the years have developed.

Justice Holmes, Justice Brandeis, Justice Van Devanter. Two of them are liberals—radicals even. The third is a conservative, a man who thinks along established lines, who has the reputation of being one of the hardest workers on that hard-working bench.

Even the similarity of their bulky black silk robes cannot make them look alike or conceal the vigor of their personalities. Their backgrounds are as varied as the ways in which they think and work. Boston and Wyoming and Kentucky were the homes of their youth—Boston in the suave days of Emerson and the transcendentalists, Wyoming of cattle rustlers and pre-Statehood vigilance committees, Kentucky recovering from the wounds of the Civil War.

JUSTICE HOLMES is, if one may judge by statements heard and read about him, essentially a man of paradox. Born into the most exclusive Boston circles, he is considered a friend of the working man and the negro. He is an aristocrat who believes in the rights of other individuals besides himself. In his youth he was wounded three times while fighting for the Union, yet he is called a Bolshevik by people who mean to imply that his views imperil the safety of the Union. He has helped to formulate a third of the decisions made during the existence of the Supreme Court, yet he is known as the great dissenter. He is proclaimed the greatest constitutional lawyer on the bench, yet there are men in high positions who feel that his liberal views are dangerous to the Constitution.

Yet these are paradoxes that become clear in the light of the past. It is Justice Holmes's history that explains Justice Holmes's trend of mind. He was born in 1841, the son of Oliver Wendell Holmes, whose witty essays delighted America. He was young in a very turbulent time. On the one hand, Emerson preached peace and hailed the joy of communing with congenial spirits at Brook Farm. On the other, Harriet Beecher Stowe railed against the Southern treatment of the negro. Abolition of slavery became a burning problem. The Puritan sense of individual liberty rebelled against slave-holding and the underlying economic causes of dissension fanned the flames of moral indignation. Young Holmes, living in the midst of the mental turmoil, was graduated from Harvard in 1861 and went directly into a regiment of Massachusetts volunteers.

Through all the Civil War he fought. He was shot through the head, the breast and the heel, he went through the horror of amateur army hospitals, and he emerged from it all a Colonel. Then he went back to Harvard for the degree of Bachelor of Law and Letters and settled down to practice law.

He was appointed to the Supreme Court in 1902 by Theodore Roosevelt. Again it was an example of that contrast that has sounded like a dominant note through his whole life. Justice Holmes was then 61, a charming and witty elderly gentleman, with a long record of scholarship and judicial experience behind him. He had practiced law, edited Kent's Commentaries, been Professor of Law at Harvard and a member of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. He was suave and cultivated, he had a degree from Oxford and he was a Corresponding Fellow of the British Academy. The man who appointed him was twenty years his junior, a violent, tempestuous person, just out of Rough Rider uniform and handling politics and problems with the same gusto with which he had handled cow ponies.

Again it was a critical time in the nation's history. Another war, this time with Spain, had pulled us out of a somewhat disorderly ivory tower into a position of international importance. The nation for whose unity Justice Holmes had fought was suddenly faced with problems of empire. Business grew obstreperous and disputed the right of government to govern. The Supreme Court was flooded with complex litigation whose solution involved new interpretations of the Constitution and meant new tests of strength.

SINCE that exciting year, when bicycles thronged every street and Gibson girls adorned every parlor, Justice Holmes has written a formidable part of the constitutional law of this country. Going to the bench at an age which is popularly believed to be one of decline, when man's power of learning is over and his faculties are slowing down, he has defied all rules by steadily growing in brilliance, in reputation, in mental stature. Even to a layman this shows itself in his writings. Speeches delivered about the time he went to the bench show an orderly, cultivated mind, logical and clear-seeing. The prose of Justice Holmes, age 88, is a living thing pringling with the combined vitality of youthful thought and the measured judgment of age. Every word compels reading. All but the essentials have been pared away, and the essentials are so forceful, so wise and so interesting, that it is only after they are read that one realizes the beauty of their garb.

He and Justice Brandeis are in many things at opposite ends of the scale, but though they have traveled different routes they arrive with amazing frequency at the same opinion. The patrician New Englander and the Jewish defender of the rights of the proletariat are friends inside as well as outside of court. They are the liberals, the old insurgents who stand together against the young conservatives of the Supreme bench. Both are defenders of the individual, both are quick champions of the rights of man. Together they have written Prospectors Gazing Northward Toward the Barren Lands After Having Been Landed by Plane on the Frozen Lake in Front of Them.

NOW THEY "MUSH" INTO THE NORTH BY AIR

Prospectors Who Search the Wilds Are Using Planes to Lessen Hardships and Keep a Link With Civilization

BY T. J. C. MARTYN

WHILE it is now commonplace to talk of the airplane shrinking the world and incidentally bringing our coastal frontiers two days' travel closer to each other, it is only when the outside world hears of the adventures of such airmen as the McAlpine party in the icy wastes beyond the Arctic Circle that the real extent of the airplane's conquest is realized. True, planes have spanned the Arctic world and Commander Byrd has penetrated to its centre over the North Pole. And what is true of the Arctic is either true or becoming true of the Antarctic, where Commander Byrd is again making history. But these are exploits conducted for special purposes, almost always in the interests of science. Less spectacularly, but in like manner, defying the dangers of high adventure, men are grimly conquering the frozen North by plane in the name of commerce.

In a country comparatively so little developed as Canada the airplane is coming into its own on a big scale. In thousands of square miles of country where the whistle of a locomotive has never broken the stillness of regions vaster than any single European country, where Eskimos and dog sledges are common sights over the packed snow trails in Winter, and canoes serve in a short and fleeting Summer, the plane clips off a month's hard travel in few swift, easy hours of flight. Thousands of lakes, some little larger than puddles and some that would take a canoe hours to traverse, afford the airplanes a safe and easy landing within every five miles. In Winter, when the water is as hard as the ground, the whole region is converted into an aviator's paradise, with a potential landing field always below, skids replacing the pontoons for landing gear.
